Government had the smallest scruple or hesitation about the renewal of the treaty, on account of the situation of our affairs with France, I knew enough of the sentiments of my Government to assure him that they were by no means desirous that Prussia should take any step at which she should feel the smallest reluctance, and, if she thought it most expedient, would postpone the conclusion of the treaty until a time which should be perfectly suitable to both parties. He said he was very glad I had given him an opportunity to assure me, in the most positive and unequivocal manner, that the situation of our affairs with France had never entered into the consideration of His Majesty's Government, in regard to the renewal of the treaty, and that it certainly never would. That the friendly sentiments of the King towards the United States rested upon grounds which could not be affected by the changes in the political views of other European Powers, and that the transactions between the American and French Governments were of a nature which could not induce any impartial and honest third party to favor the latter. He then expressed [himself] with great bitterness and severity concerning the conduct of the French Government in general, and especially upon its present treatment of the King of Sardinia.

Since beginning this letter, I have received your favor of 7th November, No. 11, with duplicates of the Nos. 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10; a copy of your letter to Mr. Gerry, of 25th June; of your despatch to Mr. King of 17th September, 1796; and extracts of his letters of 13th April, and 3d June, 1797.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The Secretary of State.

BERLIN, le 29ème Octobre,* 1798.

Nous avons reçu la note ultérieure que Monsieur Adams, ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, nous a fait l'honneur de nous remettre, en date du 29ème Octobre, et nous nous empressons d'y repliquer pour lui prouver combien nous desirons, de nôtre côté, d'apporter toute la célérité et toutes les facilités imaginables, à la négociation que nous sommes appellés à traiter avec lui.

Quelles que soient à cet égard les dispositions réciproques de Monsieur Adams, il paroit cependant qu'il a eu de la peine à reconnoitre la force des raisons qui nous empêche d'agréer les changemens proposés relativement à l'article XII, du traité de 1785. Il nous objecte que, par le droit ordinaire des gens, les propriétés neutres à bord des vaisseaux ennemis sont libres en temps de guerre. Cette règle, il est vrai, a été suivi autrefois par la plupart des Puissances de l'Europe, et elle se trouve établie dans plusieurs traités du quinzième et du quatorzième siècle; mais il est connu aussi qu'elle a été abandonnée du dépuis les inconvéniens qui en sont resultés, ayant déterminé les nations maritimes et commerçantes à s'en départir. Dès l'année 1646, les deux traités conclus par les états généraux des Provinces Unies avec la France et avec l'Angleterre, ont stipulé, "que les vaisseaux amis et neutres rendroient aussi leurs cargaisons libres;" et ce principe une fois posé, il a été reproduit et conservé dans presque tous les traités conclus dépuis cette époque entre les nations commerçantes de l'Europe. La convention arrêtée entre la Russie et l'Angleterre, en 1798, que Monsieur Adams cite dans sa note, est exclusivement dirigée contre la France, et n'est ainsi qu'une exception à la règle; et s'il est vrai, en général, que dans les commencemens de la guerre actuelle les Puissances coalisées ont crû devoir s'écarter du principe reçu, cette deviation momentanée ne peut et ne doit être attribuée qu'à des circonstances tout-à-fait particulières, et il n'en est pas moins décidé que la Prusse n'a eu qu'un seul et même système permanent relativement au commerce et à la navigation neutres. Il est fondé sur la maxime énoncée dans l'article XII, de son ancien traité avec les Etats Unis de l'Amérique, et cette règle s'accorde mieux que toute autre avec les convénances des nations commerçantes; elle abrège les formalités des preuves à fournir sur la propriété des differentes cargaisons d'une même navire; elle met la navigation à l'abri de visites importunes; elle coupe court, en un mot, à des abus, et à des entraves de toute espèce.

Nous avons d'ailleurs la conviction, que dans la guerre actuelle, où le commerce et la navigation des neutres sont assujettis à tant de procédés purement arbitraires, le principe proposé par Monsieur Adams ne seroit pas plus respecté que le précédent; plusieurs exemples récens ayant démontré que même les vaisseaux neutres uniquement chargés des marchandises neutres sont exposés à la saisie et à la confiscation, sous toutes sortes de pretextes frivoles.

Mais il seroit inutile de pousser la discussion plus loin, Monsieur Adams étant convenu avec nous, qu'au lieu de hazarder une nouvelle stipulation éventuelle et incertaine, il vaut mieux la laisser en suspense jusqu'à l'époque de la paix générale, et de s'occuper alors sérieusement des moyens d'assurer la liberté du commerce neutre sur une base solide dans les guerres futures. Il n'y aura donc autre chose à faire, pour le moment, que de supprimer provisoirement l'article XII de l'ancien traité, et d'y substituer la stipulation suivante, à laquelle nous supposons que Monsieur Adams ne trouvera rien à rédire:

"L'éxpérience ayant démontré que le principe adopté dans l'article XII du traité de 1785, selon lequel les vaisseaux libres rendent aussi les marchandises libres, n'a pas été suffisamment respecté dans les deux dernières guerres, et nommément dans celle qui dure encore, et les dispositions contradictoires des principales Puissances belligérantes ne permettant point dans le moment présent de résoudre d'une manière satisfaisante la question litigieuse, les deux hautes parties contractantes se reservent de s'entendre après le retour de la paix générale, soit séparément entr'elles, soit conjointement avec d'autres Puissances cointéressées, pour concerter avec les grandes Puissances maritimes de l'Europe tels arrangemens et tels principes permanens, qui puissent servir à consolider la liberté et la sûreté de la navigation et du commerce neutres dans les guerres futures."

Monsieur Adams s'étant rendu, dans sa dernière note, aux raisons qui empêchent le Gouvernement Prussien de comprendre le bois de construction dans la classe des articles de contrebande, nous lui proposons l'alternative, ou de conserver l'article XIII de l'ancien traité tel qu'il est, ou d'y insérer nommément la liste des effets de contrebande qui est tirée de l'article XI du traité de commerce et de navigation conclu entre la Russie et la Grande Bretagne, le 20ème Juin, 1766. Si cette précaution paroit nécessaire, il suffira d'ajouter à la fin de l'article XIII du nouveau traité le passage suivant:

"Seront censés objets de contrebande, les canons, mortiers, armes à feu, pistolets, bombes, grenades, boulets, bales, fusils, pierres à feu, mèches, poudre, salpêtre, souffre, cuirasses, piques, épées, ceinturons, poches à cartouches, selles et brides, au delà de la quantité nécessaire pour l'usage du vaisseau, et au delà de celle que doit avoir chaque homme servant sur le vaisseau, ou passager, et en général tout ce qui est compris sous la dénomination d'armes, de provisions et de munitions de guerre, de quelque espèce qu'elles puissent être."

Nous ne demandons pas mieux que de simplifier les formalités et les preuves qu'on exige des propriétaires des navires, pour constater la neutralité du vaisseau et de la cargaison; mais nous sommes cependant obligés de consulter, à cet égard, les règles établies par nos ordonnances, et les usages reçus dans nos tribunaux maritimes. Le document de construction (appellé beil-brief) étant précisement celui qui met en évidence la qualité neutre du navire, il nous paroit impossible de le rayer de la liste des papiers de mer dont les navigateurs Prussiens doivent être munis. Mais ce document n'etant pas usité sous la même forme dans le Gouvernement de la république Américaine, rien n'empêcheroit, à nôtre avis, d'y substituer pour ses navigateurs le certificat d'enrégistrement, qui en est l'équivalent, et d'exprimer cette différence dans le nouveau traité.

En revanche, nous consentirons volontiers à les dispenser du rôle d'équipage, que la constitution de leur pays ne paroit pas admettre, mais il n'en sera pas moins conservé au nombre des documens que nos lois prescrivent aux navigateurs Prussiens; et cette distinction sera également énoncées dans le nouveau traité.

Nous sommes complettement d'accord avec Monsieur Adams sur les autres modifications qu'il a proposées relativement aux articles XVI, XIX, XX, XXIII, et XXV, et comme nous présumons qu'il ne fera aucune difficulté d'accéder aux observations équitables, que nous venons de lui rappeller dans la présente note, nous n'attendons que son dernier mot pour nous occuper de la redaction d'un projet formel du nouveau traité, et de terminer ensuite le plutôt possible une négociation, dont l'heureuse et prompte issue nous intéresse autant que lui.

[TRANSLATION.]

BERLIN, 29th October,* 1798.

The Prussian Ministers to Mr. Adams.

We have received the last note which Mr. Adams, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has done us the honor to transmit, dated the 29th of October; and we hasten to reply to it, in order to show how greatly it is desired, on our part, to expedite the negotiation with which we are now entrusted, by every means in our power.

Whatever may be the reciprocal dispositions of Mr. Adams, in this respect, it appears, nevertheless, that he finds some difficulty in acknowledging the force of the reasons which have prevented us from agreeing to the proposed alterations relating to the twelfth article of the treaty of 1785. He objects that, by the ordinary law of nations, the property of neutrals, on board the vessels of enemies in times of war, is free. This rule, it is true, has heretofore been followed by most of the Powers of Europe, and it is to be found in many treaties which have been concluded during the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries; but it is also known that it has been since abandoned: the inconveniences to which it was liable having determined the maritime and commercial nations to depart from it. In the year 1646, the two treaties concluded by the States General of the United Provinces with France and England, have stipulated "that the vessels of friends and neutrals shall render their cargoes free:" and this principle, thus laid down, has been re-affirmed and preserved in almost all the treaties concluded since that epoch among the commercial nations of Europe. The convention formed between Russia and England, in the year 1798, which Mr. Adams cites in his note, is directed against France exclusively, and is, therefore, only an exception to the rule; and, if it be true that, in the beginning of the present war, the combined Powers have thought proper to depart from the received principle, this momentary deviation can only be attributed to particular circumstances; and it is not, on that account, the less true, that Prussia has had but one permanent system in relation to commerce and neutral navigation. It is founded on the maxim declared in the twelfth article of her ancient treaty with the United States of America; and this rule is better adapted than any other to the convenience of commercial nations: it has restricted the formalities of the required proofs concerning the ownership of the different cargoes of the same vessel; it protects navigation against vexatious searches; and, in a word, arrests the abuses and shackles of every kind to which it is exposed.

We are, moreover, convinced that, in the existing war, in which the commerce and navigation of neutrals are subjected to so many interruptions, purely arbitrary, the principle proposed by Mr. Adams would not be more respected than the former; many examples having occurred which show that even neutral vessels laden only with neutral merchandise are liable to be seized and confiscated under all sorts of pretexts, however frivolous.

But it would be useless to extend this discussion; Mr. Adams being convinced, with us, that, instead of hazarding a new stipulation, both eventual and uncertain, it would be better to leave it in suspense until the epoch of a general peace; and then to consider with earnestness the means of ensuring the freedom of neutral commerce, and placing it, in future wars, upon a solid basis. Nothing, therefore, remains to be done at present except to suppress, provisionally, the twelfth article of the ancient treaty, and to substitute the following stipulation, to which we suppose that no objection can be made:

"Experience having shown that the principle adopted in the twelfth article of the treaty of 1785, according to which free ships make the merchandise free, has not been sufficiently respected during the two last wars, and especially in that which is now carried on; and the contradictory dispositions of the principal belligerent Powers not permitting, at the present time, a satisfactory adjustment of the litigated question; the two high contracting parties reserve to themselves the right, after the restoration of a general peace, to resume this subject, either separately between themselves, or conjointly with other Powers whom it also concerns, in order to concert with the great maritime Powers of Europe such arrangements and such permanent principles as may serve to confirm, in future wars, the freedom and safety of neutral navigation and commerce."

Mr. Adams having, in his last note, replied to the reasons which prevent the Prussian Government from including ship timber in the class of contraband articles, we propose to him the alternative either to retain the thirteenth article of the ancient treaty as it is, or to insert in it, specifically, the list of contraband articles extracted from the eleventh article of the treaty of commerce and navigation concluded between Russia and Great Britain, the 20th of June, 1766. If the precaution shall appear necessary, it will suffice to add to the end of the thirteenth article of the new treaty the following passage:

"Shall be considered objects of contraband, cannon, mortars, fire-arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, balls, fuzils, flints, matches, powder, saltpetre, sulphur, cuirasses, pikes, swords, sword-belts, cartouch-boxes, saddles and bridles, beyond the quantity which may be necessary for the use of the vessel, and beyond that which each man serving on board the vessel, or each passenger, ought to possess; and, in general, all that can be comprised under the denominations of arms, provisions, and munitions of war, of whatever kind they may be."

We only desire to simplify the formalities and the proofs which are required of the owners of vessels, in order to verify the neutrality of the vessel and of the cargo; in this respect, however, we are obliged to consult the rules established by our laws, and the usages received in our maritime tribunals. The document of construction (called beil-brief, being precisely the one which proves the neutral quality of the ship, it appears impossible to erase it from the list of papers with which the Prussian navigators should be provided. But as this document is not used in the same form in the American republic, nothing, in our opinion, would prevent the substitution, by American navigators, of the certificate of registry, which is the equivalent for it, and set forth this difference in the new treaty.

In return, we willingly consent to dispense with the muster-roll, which, it appears, the constitution of the United States does not allow; but it will be preserved, notwithstanding, among the number of documents prescribed by our laws to the Prussian navigators, and this difference will be also declared in the new treaty.

We entirely concur with Mr. Adams in the other modifications proposed by him, respecting the articles XVI, XIX, XX, XXIII, and XXV; and as we presume that he will readily accede to the equitable observations submitted to his consideration in the present note, we shall expect his assent, in order to reduce the new treaty into proper form, and close, as soon as possible, a negotiation, the prompt and happy termination of which is alike desired by us and him.

FINCKENSTEIN,
ALVENSLEBEN,
HAUGWITZ.

BERLIN, 24th December, 1799.

Le soussigné, ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis d'Amérique, a vu avec plaisir, par la rèponse de leurs excellences à la dernière note qu'il eut l'honneur de leur remettre, que presque tous les points sur lesquels une explication etoit nécessaire au sujet du renouvellement du traité d'amitié et de commerce entre Sa Majesté et les Etats Unis se trouvent applanis; et il espère qu'à l'égard de ceux sur lesquels il reste encore à s'entendre, nulle difficulté ne s'élévera assez sérieuse pour rétarder la conclusion de la negociation à la satisfaction entière des deux Gouvernemens.

Il n'hésiteroit pas de souscrire à la stipulation proposée par leurs excellences, au lieu de l'article XII de l'ancien traité, si on en pouvoit omettre les mots suivants: "Et les dispositions contradictoires des Puissances belligérantes ne permettant point dans le moment présent de résoudre d'une manière satisfaisante la question litigieuse."

* It should be November.

Les Puissances belligérantes pourroient peut-être trouver dans ces expressions une espèce de sanction à leurs dispositions, qui ne s'accorderoit pas avec les intentions des hautes parties contractantes; et d'ailleurs, le soussigné desireroit omettre entièrement la mention d'un point sur lequel la manière de voir des deux Gouvernemens diffère, plutôt que de l'annoncer formellement comme une question litigieuse.

Pour justifier l'opinion de son Gouvernement au sujet du principe en question, il croit devoir observer qu'elle n'est pas fondée sur des traités du quatorzième ou du quinzième siècle. Il considère le principe du droit des gens comme absolument distinct des engagemens stipulés par des traités particuliers. Ceux-ci ne peuvent établir aucun principe fixe sur ce point; et parceque telles stipulations ne peuvent lier que ceux qui les contractent, et envers ceux qui les contractent; et parceque dans les dix-septième et dix-huitième, comme dans les quatorzième et quinzième siècles, differens traités ont adoptés differentes règles pour ce cas, selon la convenance et l'accord des parties contractantes.

En exceptant, donc, tous les engagemens positifs stipulés dans les traités, on peut douter si, antérieurement à la guerre Américaine, il se trouve un seul exemple d'une Puissance maritime belligérante qui ait adopté le principe de laisser couvrir les propriétés ennemies par le pavillon neutre. Car, sans parler de l'Angleterre, dont le système à cet égard est connu, la France, par l'ordonnance de 1744, rénouvellant sur ce point les dispositions de celle de 1681, déclare les propriétés ennemies à bord des navires neutres sujettes à la saisie et à la confiscation. Elle excepte de cette règle les navires du Danemarc et des Provinces Unies, conformément aux traités alors existans entre ces Puissances et la France. Cette ordonnance a continué d'avoir son effet dans les tribunaux de France jusqu'à l'époque de l'ordonnance du 26ème Juillet, 1778. Par le premier article de cette dernière, la liberté des propriétés ennemies à bord des navires est admise, comme une faveur aux neutres, mais non comme un principe du droit des gens, puisqu'on y reserve le pouvoir de la retirer au bout de six mois, si la Puissance ennemie n'accorderoit pas le réciproque. L'Espagne, par les ordonnances du 1er Juillet, 1779, et du 13ème Mars, 1780, ordonnoit également la saisie et la confiscation des propriétés ennemies trouvées sur des bâtimens neutres.

On ajoutera seulement, qu'un publiciste célèbre, sujet Prussien, qui dans la dernière moitié du siècle présent écrivoit un ouvrage fort estimé sur le droit de sgens, Vattel, y dit expressément, (livre 3, §115,) que "quand on trouve sur un vaisseau neutre des effets appartenans à l'ennemi, on s'en saisit par le droit de la guerre." Il ne cite aucun exemple où le principe contraire ait été pratiqué ou reclamé.

Cependant, lorsque le système de la neutralité armée fût annoncé, les Etats Unis, quoique Puissance belligérante, se sont empressés d'en adopter les principes; et pendant tout le tems qu'ils ont été engagés en guerre après cette époque, ils s'y sont scrupuleusement conformés. Mais à la première occasion où ils auroient pû comme Puissance neutre jouir des avantages attachés à ce système, ils s'en sont vus privés de toutes parts, non seulement par les Puissances qui n'avoient jamais accédé à ces principes, mais aussi par les fondateurs mêmes du système. Les dispositions des Puissances coalisées sur ces points etoient, il est vrai, dirigées seulement contre la France, mais leur opération ne s'étendoit pas moins sur tous les neutres, et particulièrement sur les Etats Unis. Quelque particulières que fussent les circonstances de la guerre, les droits de la neutralité n'en pouvoient être affectés; les Etats Unis ont regrettés l'abandon des principes favorables aux intérêts de la neutralité, mais ils ont senti ne pouvoir pas l'empecher, et ils ont été persuadés que l'équité ne pouvoit exiger d'eux d'être victimes à la fois de la règle et de l'exception, d'être liés comme partie belligérante à des loix, dont on leur refuse les avantages comme Puissance neutre.

Le Gouvernement des Etats Unis, cependant, a voulu prouver qu'il ne desire jamais s'écarter du principe adopté dans le traité de 1785; que dans les occasions où il ne sauroit y adhérer sans faire injustice à la nation dont les intérêts lui sont confiés. En conséquence de ses instructions, le soussigné a l'honneur de proposer, en adoptant, au lieu de l'article XII la stipulation contenüe dans la note de leurs excellences, (avec omission des mots deja cités,) d'y ajouter une clause à cet effet:

"Et si, pendant cet intervalle, l'une des hautes parties contractantes se trouve engagée dans une guerre à laquelle l'autre reste neutre, la Puissance belligérante respectera toute propriété ennemie chargée à bord des bâtimens de la partie neutre; pourvu que la Puissance ennemie reconnoisse le même principe à l'égard de tout bâtiment neutre, et que les décisions de ses tribunaux maritimes y soient conformés."

Si cette proposition n'a pas le bonheur d'être agrée par leurs excellences, le soussigné prend la liberté d'en faire une autre: c'est d'adopter à peu près la formule du traité de 1766, entre la Russie et la Grand Bretagne, et de dire que "quant à la recherche des bâtimens marchands en tems de guerre, les vaisseaux de guerre et les armateurs de la Puissance belligérante se comporteront aussi favorablement que la raison de guerre pour lors existante pourra le permettre, en observant, le plus qu'il sera possible, les principes et les règles du droit des gens généralement reconnus."

Il cite ce traité entre la Russie et la Grand Bretagne, parceque leurs excellences proposent de la prendre pour règle en définissant la contrebande, et parceque cet article est rénouvellé par le traité de commerce conclu entre ces deux mêmes Puissances, le 10ème (21) Février, 1797.

Le soussigné s' étoit flatté, d'après la réponse de leurs excellences à sa première note, que le bois de construction seroit le seul article parmi ceux qu'il y avoit specifié qu'elles auroient difficulté à admettre dans la liste de contrebande. En adoptant la proposition de conserver les dispositions à l'égard de la contrebande contenues dans l'article XIII de l'ancien traité, il espère encore qu'elles consentiront à ajouter les articles cités dans sa première note, à l'exception des bois de construction, à la liste du traité de 1766, entre la Russie et la Grande Bretagne. Cet arrangement lui paroit devoir être facilité, par le renouvellement de la stipulation que la contrebande même ne sera pas sujette à confiscation.

Il seroit aussi peut-être à propos d'omettre le terme de provisions, qui paroit être synonyme à celui de munitions de guerre, et qui pourroit être interpreté dans un sens plus étendu que l'intention des hautes parties contractantes ne comporte.

Pour ce qui regarde les papiers à spécifier pour prouver la neutralité des vaisseaux et de leurs cargaisons, le soussigné a l'honneur d'observer, qu'en désignant certains documens, que les vaisseaux armés d'une des hautes parties contractantes seroient en droit d'exiger en tems de guerre des navires marchands de l'autre, les Gouvernemens respectifs n'entendent pas limiter le pouvoir réciproque d'ordonner, pour le réglement intérieur de leur commerce, tel ou tel autre document ou papier qu'ils pourroient trouver à propos de préscrire à leurs sujets ou citoyens. Que, par conséquent, le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté pourroit toujours exiger de ses sujets commerçans d'avoir le beil-brief à bord de leurs bâtimens, comme le Gouvernement des Etats Unis pourroit toujours préscrire à leurs navigateurs d'être pourvus du certificat d'enrégistrement, quand même ces papiers ne seroient pas désignés dans le traité. Mais, de part et d'autre, la nature de ce document paroit être plutôt de prouver la propriété du navire, entre l'individu et son Gouvernement, que de prouver sa neutralité à des officiers ou tribunaux étrangers. C'est le document propre, sur le crédit duquel le Gouvernement se fonde en accordant sa protection aux bâtimens qui en sont pourvus; mais, à l'égard des étrangers, cela devient un papier superflu, lorsque le passeport de mer, muni de la signature des officiers publics, donne encore plus d'authenticité à tout ce qu'il peut attester.

Lorsqu'un vaisseau armé d'une Puissance belligérante et un bâtiment marchand d'une Puissance neutre se rencontrent en mer, il se trouve naturellement trois objets dont le dernier doit prouver au premier la neutralité,—le navire, sa cargaison, et sa compagnie. Chacun de ses objets a son propre document. Le passeport de mer est celui qui concerne particulièrement le navire; et lorsque celui-ci se trouve en règle, il semble peu nécessaire de donner le droit d'en exiger d'autres, dont le seul effet seroit de confirmer ce que lui seul doit suffisamment prouver.

Le soussigné a pris la liberté de faire ces observations, parcequ'il a cru que l'intérêt des deux hautes parties contractantes se trouveroit également consulté en ne pas stipulant dans un traité pour des documens qui semblent plutôt du ressort de l'administration intérieure, et que chacun des Gouvernemens voudroit vraisemblablement conserver à sa disposition pour pouvoir les continuer ou les changer comme il le trouveroit bon. On pourroit même ajouter à l'article où il seroit question des papiers une clause à cet effet. Cependant, si leurs excellences continuent à le trouver nécessaire, le soussigné n'hesitera pas à spécifier le beil-brief pour les navires Prussiens, et le certificat d'enrégistrement pour ceux des Etats Unis, parmi les papiers à désigner dans le traité.

Il admettra de même le rôle d'équipage pour les navires des deux nations. Ce papier n'est pas exclu par la constitution des Etats Unis. Aucuns de leurs traités précédens, il est vrai, ne l'a exigé, mais l'usage de l'avoir s'est récemment établi, en conséquence des inconvéniens qu'on a souffert en ne l'ayant pas, et le Gouvernement ne fera pas de difficulté à le nommer expressément dans le nouveau traité; ce qui préviendra la possibilité de tout mal-entendu à cet égard.

Comme tous ces papiers ne doivent être stipulés que pour les cas où l'une des hautes parties contractantes seroit en guerre, et que leur seul objet est de prouver la neutralité de navires et leurs chargemens de l'autre, il seroit bon de donner un délai (de trois mois, par exemple,) après la declaration de guerre, ou la notification de l'état d'hostilité; avant l'expiration duquel, ces documens ne seroient pas censés absolument nécessaires. La justice d'un pareil arrangement devient évident, en considérant qu'il faudra toujours un certain tems pour fournir aux bâtimens de la partie neutre des papiers, dont l'usage cessera naturellement en tems de paix.

Le soussigné, de plus, a l'honneur de faire savoir à leurs excellences, que depuis la date de la prèmiere note qu'il eut l'honneur de leur remettre, il a reçu la connoissance officielle d'une loi des Etats Unis, approuvée par le Président le septième du mois de Juillet dernier; par laquelle tous les traités entre les Etats Unis et la France sont déclarés n'être plus obligatoires sur le Gouvernement et les citoyens des Etats Unis. Les motifs sur lesquels cette loi est fondée sont énoncés dans son préambule: "Parceque les engagemens de ces traités avoient été maintefois violés de la part du Gouvernement François; parceque les justes réclamations des Etats Unis pour la réparation de ces injures avoient été rejettées, et leurs efforts pour négocier un arrangement amical de tous les différens entre les deux nations repoussés avec indignité; et parceque sous l'autorité du Gouvernement François il continueroit de se poursuivre un système de violence prédatoire, contraire aux dits traités ainsi qu'aux droits d'une nation libre et independante." En conséquence de cette loi, il ne sera pas nécessaire de stipuler de la part des Etats Unis, dans le nouveau traité, ces exceptions en faveur de la France proposées dans la première note du soussigné, ni de renouveller celle qui se trouve dans l'article 19 du traité de 1785.

Le soussigné finit en observant qu'il n'attend que le moment qui conviendra à leurs excellences, soit pour recevoir le projet formel du traité qu'elles feront rédiger, soit pour leur en présenter un, selon qu'elles le trouveront à propos.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

A leurs excellences, les MINISTRES d'ETAT, &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Adams to the Prussian Ministers.

BERLIN, 24*th December*, 1798.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has seen, with pleasure, in the reply of their excellencies, in their last note, that almost all the points relating to the renewal of the treaty of commerce between His Majesty and the United States, which required discussion, are adjusted; and that, with regard to those upon which some further explanation is still necessary, no difficulty will arise sufficiently serious to retard the conclusion of the negotiation to the entire satisfaction of the two Governments.

He would not hesitate to subscribe to the stipulation proposed by their excellencies, as a substitute for the 12th article of the ancient treaty, if he could omit the following words: "And the opposing dispositions of the belligerent Powers not permitting the satisfactory adjustment, at the present moment, of the contested question." It is possible that the belligerent Powers may find in these expressions a kind of sanction to their dispositions, which would not accord with the intentions of the high contracting parties; and besides, the undersigned would desire to omit entirely an allusion to a point, of which it is the desire of the two Governments to defer the consideration, rather than to announce it, formally, as a contested question.

In order to justify the opinion of his Government, on the subject of the principle in question, he believes it his duty to observe that it is not founded on the treaties of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. He considers the principle of the law of nations as absolutely distinct from the engagements stipulated by particular treaties. These cannot establish a fixed principle on this point; because such stipulations bind only the parties by whom they are made, and the persons on whom they operate; and because, too, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as well as in the fourteenth and fifteenth, different treaties have adopted different rules for each particular case, according to the convenience and agreement of the contracting parties.

Rejecting, therefore, all positive engagements stipulated in treaties, it may be well doubted whether, antecedently to the American war, a single example can be found of a maritime belligerent Power who has adopted the principle that enemy's property is protected by a neutral flag. For, without speaking of England, whose system in this respect is known, France, by the ordinance of 1744, renewing the provisions of that of 1781, declares enemies' property on board neutral vessels subject to seizure and confiscation. It excepts from this rule the ships of Denmark and the United Provinces, conformably to the treaties then existing between these Powers and France. This ordinance has continued to have its effect, in the tribunals of France, to the epoch of the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778. By the first article of this last, the freedom of enemies' property on board of neutral ships is yielded to neutrals as a favor, but not as a principle of the laws of nations, since the power is reserved to withdraw it at the expiration of six months, if a reciprocal stipulation should not be conceded by the enemy. Spain, by the ordinances of the 1st of July, 1779, and 13th of March, 1780, ordered, in like manner, the seizure and confiscation of enemies' property found in neutral vessels.

It will only be added, that a celebrated publicist, a Prussian subject, who, in the latter part of the present century, wrote a highly esteemed work upon the law of nations, Vattel, says expressly, (book 3, section 115), that "when effects belonging to an enemy are found on board a neutral vessel, they may be seized by the laws of war." He cites no example where the opposite principle has been practised or insisted on.

When the system of armed neutrality, however, was announced, the United States, although a belligerent Power, hastened to adopt its principles; and during the period succeeding this epoch in which they were engaged in war, they scrupulously conformed to them. But, on the first occasion, when, as a neutral Power, they might have enjoyed the advantages attached to this system, they saw themselves deprived of these advantages, not only by the Powers who had never acceded to these principles, but also by even the founders of the system. The intentions of the combined Powers, it is true, were exclusively directed against France, but the operation of their measures did not extend the less to all neutrals, and especially to the United States. However peculiar may have been the circumstances of the war, the rights of neutrality could not be thereby affected. The United States have regretted the abandonment of principles favorable to the interests of neutrality, but they have perceived their inability to prevent it; and they are persuaded that equity cannot require of them to be the victims, at the same time, both of the rule and of the exception; to be bound, as a belligerent party, by laws, of the advantages of which, as a neutral power, they are wholly deprived.

It is the wish, however, of the Government of the United States, to prove that it has no desire to depart from the principles adopted by the treaty of 1785, except upon occasions when an adherence to those principles would be an act of injustice to the nation whose interests are confided to it. In consequence of the instruction he has received, the undersigned has the honor to propose, in adopting, (with the omission of the words already cited,) the stipulation contained in the note of their excellencies, as a substitute for the twelfth article, the insertion of a clause to the following effect:

"And if, during this interval, one of the high contracting parties shall be engaged in a war to which the other is neutral, the belligerent Power will respect all the property of enemies laden on board the vessels of the neutral party, provided that the belligerent Power shall acknowledge the same principle with regard to every neutral vessel, and that the decision of his maritime tribunals shall conform to it."

If this proposition has not the good fortune to be accepted by their excellencies, the undersigned takes the liberty to make another: it is to adopt nearly the formula of the treaty of 1766, between Russia and Great Britain, and to say that, "as to the search of merchant vessels, in time of war, the vessels of war and the private armed vessels of the belligerent Power will conduct themselves as favorably as the objects of the then existing war will permit; observing, as much as possible, the principles and rules of the laws of nations, as generally recognized."

He cites this treaty between Russia and Great Britain, because their excellencies propose to take it as authority in defining the articles of contraband, and because this article is renewed by the treaty of commerce concluded between the same two Powers the 10th (21st) February, 1797.

The undersigned had flattered himself, after their excellencies' reply to his first note, that ship timber would be the only article of those which he had specified which they would have any difficulty in admitting in the list of contraband. In adopting the proposition to preserve the principles, with regard to contraband, contained in the 13th article of the ancient treaty, he still hopes that they will consent to add the articles cited in his first note, with the exception of ship timber, to the list contained in the treaty of 1766, between Russia and Great Britain. He had supposed that the stipulation that even contraband articles should not be subject to confiscation would have the tendency to facilitate this arrangement.

It would also, perhaps, be proper to omit the term provisions, which appears synonimous with that of munitions of war, and which is susceptible of being interpreted in a broader sense than that intended by the high contracting parties.

As to what regards the papers to be produced, in order to prove the neutrality of the vessels and their cargoes, the undersigned has the honor to observe, that, in designating certain documents, which the armed vessels of one of the high contracting parties should have the right to demand in time of war of the merchant vessels of the other, the respective Governments do not intend to restrict the reciprocal power of ordering, for the municipal regulation of their commerce, whatever document or paper they may think proper to prescribe to their citizens or subjects; that, consequently, the Government of His Majesty may, at all times, require his commercial subjects to have the beil-brief on board their vessels; and, in like manner, the Government of the United States may order their seamen to be provided with a certificate of registry, although neither of these papers may be prescribed by the treaty. But, on the part of both, the nature of this document appears to be rather to prove the ownership of the vessel, on a question concerning the individual and his Government than the neutrality of the vessel, before the officers or tribunals of a foreign Power. It is the very document, on the credit of which the Government relies in granting its protection to the vessels which may be provided with it; but, as it regards foreigners, it becomes a superfluous document, when the sea-letter, supported by the signature of public officers, gives still greater authenticity to all that it can attest.

When the armed vessel of a belligerent Power and the merchant vessel of a neutral Power meet together at sea, three objects are presented, to which the first will naturally look in order to ascertain the neutrality of the second—the vessel, the cargo, and the crew. Each of these objects has its own document. The sea-letter is that which particularly concerns the vessel; and, when that is found perfectly regular, it seems unnecessary to confer the right to exact others; the only effect of which would be to confirm what that alone ought sufficiently to prove.

The undersigned has taken the liberty to make these observations, because he has thought that the interests of the two high contracting parties would be equally consulted by not stipulating in a treaty for documents which seem more properly to appertain to the interior administration, and which each Government would probably desire to continue or to change, as its own policy might dictate, without embarrassment or control. A clause to that effect may even be added to this article, where a question may arise respecting the papers. However, if their excellencies shall continue to think it necessary, the undersigned will not hesitate to specify the beil-brief for the Prussian vessels, and the certificate of registry for those of the United States, among the papers designated in the treaty.

He will also admit the muster-roll for the vessels of the two nations. This paper is not excluded by the constitution of the United States. It is true, that it is not required by any of their former treaties; but the usage of having it is recently established, in consequence of the inconveniences which have been felt from not possessing it; and the Government will find no difficulty in expressly naming it in the new treaty, so as to prevent the possibility of any misunderstanding on this subject.

As all these papers ought to be stipulated only for the case when one of the high contracting parties shall be at war, and as their sole object is to prove the neutrality of the vessels and their cargoes, it would seem proper to give a delay (of three months, for example,) after the declaration of war, or notification of hostilities, before the expiration of which, these documents shall not be considered absolutely necessary. The justice of a similar arrangement will be evident, when it is considered that some time must be requisite to furnish the vessels of the neutral party with papers, the use of which will naturally cease in time of peace.

The undersigned has also the honor to apprise their excellencies that, subsequently to the last note he has had the honor to transmit to them, he has received official information of a law of the United States, approved by the President of the United States, the 7th of last July, by which all the treaties between the United States and France are declared to be no longer obligatory upon the Government and citizens of the United States. The reasons upon which this law is founded are declared in the preamble: "Because the engagements contained in these treaties have been manifestly violated on the part of the Government of France; because the just demand of the United States, for the reparation of these injuries have been rejected, and their efforts to negotiate an amicable arrangement, upon all the differences existing between the two nations, rejected with indignity; and because, under the authority of the Government of France, a system of predatory violence has been continued, opposed alike to the aforesaid treaties, and to the rights of a free and independent nation." In consequence of this law, it will not be necessary to stipulate, on the part of the United States, in the new treaty, the exceptions in favor of France, proposed in the first note of the undersigned; nor to renew that which is contained in the 19th article of the treaty of 1785.

The undersigned concludes, by observing, that he only awaits the time which will be convenient to their excellencies, either to receive the formal project of a treaty which they shall have prepared, or to present one himself, as shall be most acceptable to them.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

To their Excellencies, the MINISTERS OF STATE, &c.

No. 144.

SIR: BERLIN, 4th April, 1799.

Since I had the honor of writing to you last, I have received from the department of Foreign Affairs here a note, with a copy of the full powers given by the King to the three ministers at the head of that department, to renew the treaty of commerce between the two Powers, and they sent me, at the same time, the project of a treaty, in the French language. I have replied, by a note containing my observations upon such parts of the projected plan as appeared to me to require them, and have returned the plan, with such alterations noted in the margin as I thought would be necessary or proper, and with a copy of the same plan, as varied by the marginal alterations, in our own language, for the consideration of the cabinet. I enclose herewith copies of these papers, excepting of the projects for a treaty, which I shall reserve until we shall have agreed upon the tenor of the instrument; and, in the notes themselves, you will see in what respects they differ from the former treaty.

It is more than a fortnight since I delivered to Count Finckenstein my reply, with the two projects; and Count Haugwitz had before had them a fortnight in his possession. He told me that there would be few objections, perhaps none at all, to the alterations I proposed; and I do not apprehend that any further essential difficulty will occur to impede an agreement and the conclusion of the treaty.

I did not think it expedient to insist any further upon comprising naval stores among the articles of contraband, because they had given up the point of making free ships free goods; and, as it was evidently with reluctance on their part, I considered myself fully authorized by your instructions to show a disposition to comply with their wishes in the other particular. These articles have, indeed, never been allowed by this country to be contraband, and even Great Britain has generally considered them as free, so far as Prussia was concerned. In the general Prussian code of laws, they are expressly named as not contraband, and they could not have been admitted under the opposite denomination, without repealing a law which has reference to all other nations as well as to the United States.

The alteration in the twenty-first article I agreed, without hesitation, to adopt, as it appeared much more equitable than the former arrangement, and as the salvage allowed to ships of war is the same which the British Courts of Admiralty have allowed in cases of recapture of American vessels from French cruizers, though without any stipulation upon the subject by treaty. And I have not understood that any complaint has been made against this disposition.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

BERLIN, le 19 Février, 1799.

La note que Monsieur Adams, ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, nous a fait l'honneur de nous adresser, en date du 24 Decembre dernier, nous approche du dénouement de la négociation interessante dont nous nous sommes occupés avec lui pendant son séjour à Berlin, et nous nous voyons en état présentement de lui communiquer ci-joint le projet du nouveau traité, sur lequel il ne reste plus qu'un petit nombre d'observations à faire.

Nous lui avions proposé, dans nôtre office du 29 Novembre, de laisser tomber entièrement la discussion qui s'est élévée au sujet de l'article XII, ayant pour objet la navigation neutre; et c'est le parti que nous prendrons encore aujourd'hui en adoptant, tout uniment, la stipulation qui doit être substituée à l'ancienne. Nous y avons rayé, selon le désir de Monsieur Adams, le passage où il etoit question des dispositions contradictoires des Puissances actuellement belligérantes, et en suivant l'analogie du traité conclû en 1766 entre la Russie et la Grande Bretagne, nous avons ajouté la clause supplétoire qui est rélative à la visite des bâtimens marchands en tems de guerre; moyennant quoi cet article se trouve parfaitement en règle.

Il n'en est pas de même du XIII, qui se rapporte aux objets de contrebande. Nous avons déclaré à Monsieur Adams, dès nôtre première note du 25 Septembre, 1798: "Que s'il devoit être nécessaire de les spécifier en détail dans le nouveau traité, nous serions obligés de nous en tenir à ceux qui ont été réputés et adoptés comme tels dans la convention maritime conclüe entre la Prusse et la Russie le 8 Mai, 1781, à l'instar du traité de commerce et de navigation arrêté entre la Russie et la Grande Bretagne le 20 Juin, 1766."

D'après ce principe, nous nous sommes refusés à placer sur la liste des articles de contrebande le bois de construction, et nous avons décliné aussi tacitement les autres exceptions que Monsieur Adams nous avoit proposées. Ce sont autant de productions du sol ou de l'industrie Prussienne, qui ont toujours passé comme marchandises licites dans toutes les guerres, et que nous ne sommes pas les maîtres de prohiber. Monsieur Adams voudra donc bien conserver, à nôtre exemple, l'ancienne liste, qui a servi de règle jusqu'ici à toutes les Puissances maritimes. Nous y avons omis le mot provisions, qui lui a paru sujet à inconvénient.

Pour témoigner à ce ministre combien nous sommes disposés d'entrer dans ses vues, et d'abréger autant que possible les formalités superflues, nous consentons à supprimer celle du document de construction, et nous l'avons conséquemment passé sous silence dans l'article XIV; de sorte que les vaisseaux neutres n'auront besoin en tems de guerre d'autres papiers de mer que du passeport, du rôle d'équipage, et de la certe-partie. On a accordé en sus aux navigateurs, suivant la proposition de Monsieur Adams, un délai de trois mois après la déclaration de guerre, pour leur laisser le tems de se munir de ses documens.

Enfin, nous avons rayé aussi, dans les articles XIX et XX, les exceptions en faveur de la France, qui ont été révoquées par la loi des Etats Unis du 7 Juillet dernier.

Après avoir deféré ainsi, en tout ce qui dépendoit de nous, aux propositions de Monsieur Adams, et aux vœux de ses commettans, il nous reste à fixer son attention sur un article de l'ancien traité, qui n'a pas encore été rélévé dans le cours de nôtre negociation, et qui exige, cependant de toute nécessité, une reforme. Il s'agit du XXI, dans lequel on a établi, en 1785, des primes exorbitantes aux dépens des navires marchands, qui en tems de guerre pourroient être repris sur l'ennemi par les vaisseaux de guerre, ou armateurs de l'une et de l'autre nation. La rémunération promise aux armateurs a été fixée au tiers de la valeur du bâtiment et de la cargaison, lorsque le navire n'aura pas été au pouvoir de l'ennemi au delà de vingt-quatre heures, et le propriétaire devoit être condamné à perdre le tout lorsque le vaisseau seroit repris plus tard qu'après vingt-quatre heures.

Quand aux vaisseaux de guerre, on leur adjugeoit, dans le premier de ces cas, un trentième de la valeur, et dans le second cas un dixième. C'etoit là le taux usité à l'époque où l'ancien traité fut conclu, mais du depuis le nouveau code de loix qui a été introduit dans la monarchie Prussienne à statué sur cette matière: (partie I, titre 9, § 208—210.)

"Que si un armateur ou vaisseau de guerre Prussien reprend un navire ou des marchandises appartenans à des sujets du Roi, ou à ceux d'une Puissance amie ou neutre, le preneur ne doit conserver son butin que dans le cas où le navire aura déjà été conduit avant la reprise dans un port ennemi ou neutre. Mais si la reprise a lieu avant que le navire ou la cargaison ayant été conduit dans un port ennemi ou neutre, ils seront restitués au premier propriétaire moyennant une rétribution. Celle-ci est fixée au tiers de la valeur pour les armateurs, et elle sera determinée pour les vaisseaux de guerre dans chaque cas particulier par les tribunaux maritimes."

Ce réglement, qui a été sanctionné encore par une ordonnance royale publiée en date du 24 Septembre 1798, adoucit à plusieurs égards les stipulations du traité de 1785, et abolit surtout le délai si court et si injuste des vingt-quatre heures, qui suffisoit autrefois pour décider, au préjudice du propriétaire légitime, le sort d'un vaisseau tombé au pouvoir de l'ennemi.

Cependant, peu après que cette loi avoit été émanée dans les états du Roi, la cour de Madrid invita Sa Majesté, au mois de Novembre dernier, "d'observer à l'avenir réciproquement entre les deux Puissances l'usage établi par les ordonnances maritimes de l'Espagne, portant, que tout bâtiment national, ami ou neutre, repris sur l'ennemi, sera restitué au propriétaire moyennant une rémunération du huitième de la valeur pour les vaisseaux de guerre, et du sixième pour les simples armateurs."

Le Roi s'est empressé d'adopter le principe d'humanité et de modération dont Sa Majesté Catolique lui a proposé l'exemple, et les deux cours sont convenues de s'y conformer dans la suite de part et d'autre.

Il est à présumer que les Etats Unis de l'Amérique, qui, dans leur premier traité avec la Prusse, ont manifesté d'une manière si éclatante l'intention généreuse de soustraire autant que possible la navigation et le commerce aux influences de la guerre, ne voudront pas rester en arrière dans l'occasion présente; et nous croyons pouvoir en appeller avec confiance à leur ministre. Il sentira de lui-même qu'il ne nous seroit point permis aujourd'hui d'agréer des stipulations qui portassent atteinte au dispositif du code actuel de nos loix, et qu'ainsi dans tous les cas nous serions obligés de réduire l'article XXI du traité de 1785 aux premières modifications ci-dessus énoncées. Mais nous nous en remettons au choix de Monsieur Adams, s'il veut les admettre sur le même pied dans le nouveau traité à conclure, ou s'il préfère de leur substituer les conditions plus modiques encore, qui dérivent des ordonnances maritimes de l'Espagne? Nous ferons à cet égard ce qui sera de sa convenance, et nous n'attendons que sa réponse pour suppléer l'article qui est resté en blanc.

Dès lors aussi, et dans la supposition que nous sommes maintenant d'accord avec lui sur toutes les autres stipulations de nôtre projet, nous ferons expédier l'instrument du traité en double, et nous ne manquerons pas de lui indiquer en suite le jour où nous pourrons nous réunir pour procéder à la signature et à l'échange des pleinpouvoirs. En attendant, nous avons l'honneur de lui communiquer ci-joint la copie de celui dont nous nous trouvons munis.

FINCKENSTEIN,
ALVENSLEBEN,
HAUGWITZ.

A MONSIEUR ADAMS, Ministre Plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique.

The Prussian Ministers to Mr. Adams.

BERLIN, 19*th February*, 1799.

The note, dated the 24th December last, which Mr. Adams, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, has done us the honor to transmit, brings us to the close of the interesting negotiation with which we have been occupied with him during his residence at Berlin; and we now find ourselves prepared to communicate the subjoined projet of a new treaty, upon which it will be necessary to make a few observations.

We had proposed to him, in our note of the 29th November, to omit entirely the discussion which has arisen on the subject of the twelfth article, relating to neutral navigation; and we are now governed by the same desire in adopting, without variation, the stipulation which ought to be substituted for the one contained in the ancient treaty. Agreeably to the desire expressed by Mr. Adams, we have expunged the passage which refers to "the contradictory dispositions of the present belligerent Powers;" and, following the analogy of the treaty concluded in 1766 between Russia and Great Britain, we have added an additional clause, which relates to the search of merchant vessels in time of war; by means of which this article will be found perfectly regular.

It is different with the thirteenth article, which concerns objects of contraband. We have declared to Mr. Adams, in our first note of the 25th of September, 1798, "that, if it should be necessary to specify them in detail in the new treaty, we shall be obliged to restrict them to those which have been stipulated and adopted as such in the maritime convention concluded between Prussia and Russia, the 8th of May, 1781, after the example of the treaty of commerce and navigation concluded between Russia and Great Britain, the 20th of June, 1766."

According to this principle, we have declined to place ship timber on the list of articles of contraband; and we have also tacitly omitted the other exceptions which Mr. Adams has proposed to us. These are, also, the productions of the soil, or of the industry of Prussia, which have been considered in every war as lawful merchandise, and which we have no power to prohibit. Mr. Adams will, therefore, be willing, after our example, to adhere to the ancient list, which has, to the present time, served as a rule for all the maritime Powers. We have in this article omitted the word provisions, which seemed to him liable to objections.

To manifest to this minister how much we are disposed to enter into his views, as well as to abridge superfluous formalities, we consent to suppress the document showing the building of the vessel, and we have, therefore, passed it over in silence in the 14th article; so that, in time of war, neutral vessels will have occasion for no other papers, except the sea-letter, muster-roll, and charter-party. Agreeably to the proposition of Mr. Adams, a delay of three months, after a declaration of war, is granted to the respective navigators to provide themselves with the required documents.

Finally, we have expunged from the nineteenth and twentieth articles the exceptions in favor of France, which have been revoked by the law of the United States of the 7th of last July.

After having thus yielded to the propositions of Mr. Adams, and to the views of his Government, all that depended upon us, it remains for us to invite his attention to an article of the ancient treaty, which has not yet been noticed in the course of the negotiation, and which seems, nevertheless, to require revision. We refer to the twenty-first article, which has established, in 1785, exorbitant insurances at the expense of the merchant vessels, which, in time of war, may be retaken from the enemy by vessels of war, or private armed vessels of either nation. The promised remuneration to the private armed vessels has been fixed at one-third of the value of the vessel and cargo, when the vessel shall not have been in the power of the enemy more than twenty-four hours, and the owner would be condemned to lose the whole should the vessel be retaken after twenty-four hours.

As to vessels of war, a thirtieth of the value is adjudged to them, in the first case, and a tenth in the second. At the time the ancient treaty was concluded, these were the customary rates; but a new code of laws, subsequently introduced into the Prussian monarchy, has adopted on this subject the following regulation: Title 9, § 208–210.

"That if a Prussian privateer, or vessel of war, should retake a ship or merchandise belonging to the subjects of the King, or to those of a friendly or neutral Power, the captor ought not to retain his booty, except where the vessel shall have been carried, before the re-capture, into a neutral or enemy's port. But if the re-capture has taken place before the vessel, or cargo, shall have been carried into an enemy's or neutral port, they shall be restored to the first owner, upon a recompense being made; this recompense, in the case of private armed vessels, is fixed at one-third of the value; and, where vessels of war are concerned, it shall be determined, in each particular case, by the maritime tribunals."

This regulation, which has been sanctioned by a royal ordinance, published and dated the 24th September, 1798, has, in many respects, moderated the stipulations of the treaty of 1785, and especially has abolished the short and unjust delay of twenty-four hours, which formerly, to the injury of the legitimate owner, sufficed to determine the fate of a vessel captured by the enemy.

A short time, however, after this law had been introduced into the dominions of the King, the court of Madrid invited his majesty, last November, "to observe, reciprocally, in future, between the two Powers, the usage established by the maritime ordinances of Spain, declaring, that every national vessel, friend or neutral, captured from the enemy, shall be restored to the owner, for a remuneration of one-eighth of the value, in the case of a vessel of war, and one-sixth to privateers only."

The King hastened to adopt the principle of humanity, thus proposed for his imitation by His Catholic Majesty; and the two courts have, accordingly, agreed to conform to it.

It is to be presumed that the United States of America, who, in their first treaty with Prussia, have so clearly manifested the generous intention to withdraw, as much as possible, navigation and commerce from the effects of war, will not, on this occasion, evince a disposition less liberal than others; and we therefore believe that we can appeal with confidence to their minister. He will himself perceive that we could not be at liberty to agree to stipulations which would impair the sanctions of an existing law, and that, therefore, in any event, we shall be obliged to conform the tweny-first article to the first modifications herein announced. We would submit it to his option, whether in the treaty to be concluded he will adopt these modifications, or prefer, as a substitute, the still more moderate regulations derived from the maritime ordinances of Spain. In this respect, we will do whatever he may think proper to suggest; and we only expect his reply, to supply the article which remains in blank.

As soon as this shall be done, supposing that we are now agreed on all the other stipulations of our projet, we will cause two draughts of the treaty to be prepared, and will not fail to inform him of the day when we may assemble, for the purpose of proceeding to the signature and to the exchange of the full powers. In anticipation of which, we have the honor to communicate herewith a copy of that with which we are provided.

FINCKENSTEIN,
ALVENSLEBEN,
HAUGWITZ.

Leur donnons plein et absolu pouvoir par les présentes, tant conjointement que séparément, de conférer et délibérer sur les objets qui y sont rélatifs, d'arreter les stipulations que le changement des circonstances a rendu nécessaires, et de signer ensuite le nouveau traité, et telles autres conventions, déclarations, ou actes quelconques, qu'ils jugeront convénables pour consommer leur négociation. Promettant, en foi et parole de Roi, d'avoir pour agréable, tenir ferme et stable à toujours, accomplir et éxécuter ponctuellement tout ce que nos dits ministres auront stipulé, conclu, et signé en vertu du présent pleinpouvoir, sans jamais y contrevenir, ni permettre qu'il y soit contrevenu pour quelque cause et sous quelque prétexte que ce puisse être; comme aussi d'en faire expédier nos lettres de ratifications en bonne forme, et de les faire délivrer pour être échangées dans le tems dont il sera convenu.

En foi de quoi, nous avons signé les présentes, et y avons fait apposer nôtre sceau royal.

[TRANSLATION.]

Full powers to the Ministers of State and of the cabinet, Count of Finckenstein, Baron of Alvensleben, and Count of Haugwitz, having for its object the renewal of the treaty of commerce and friendship with the United States of America.

We, FREDERICK WILLIAM the Third, by the grace of God, King of Prussia, make known to whomsoever it may concern:

The United States of America having proposed to us the renewal of the treaty of commerce and friendship which our august predecessor, King Frederick the Second of glorious memory, concluded with them the 10th September, 1785; and it being equally our intention to establish on a solid basis the ties of commerce and good intelligence which, to the present time, have so happily subsisted between Prussia and the American republic: we have nominated, constituted, and deputed, and do nominate, constitute, and depute our ministers plenipotentiary—

Charles William, Count of Finckenstein, our minister of state, of war, and of the cabinet; knight of the orders of the black and red eagle, and commander of that of St. John of Jerusalem;

Philip Charles, Baron of Alvensleben, our minister of state, of war, and of the cabinet; knight of the orders of the black and red eagle, and of that of St. John of Jerusalem;

And Christian Henri-Curce, Count of Haugwitz, our minister of state, of war, and of the cabinet, knight of the orders of the black and red eagle:

To negotiate with John Quincy Adams, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America near our court, the treaty of commerce and friendship which ought to be substituted for the former; giving them, by these presents, jointly and separately, full and absolute power to confer and deliberate on the objects relating thereto, to conclude the stipulations which a change of circumstances has rendered necessary, and thereafter to sign a new treaty, and such other conventions, declarations, or acts, as they may judge suitable, in order to consummate their negotiation: promising, upon the faith and word of a King, to consider as right, to hold firm and stable, forever, and to accomplish and execute punctually all that our said ministers shall have stipulated, concluded, and signed, in virtue of the present full powers, without either contravening it, or permitting its contravention by others, from any cause, or on any pretext whatsoever; as also to cause our letters of ratification, in proper form, to be issued and delivered, in order to be exchanged within the time which may be agreed upon.

In faith of which, we have signed these presents, and have caused our royal seal to be affixed thereto.

Given at Berlin the 10th of December, in the year of our Lord 1798, and of our reign the second.

FREDERICK WILLIAM. [L. S.]

BERLIN, le 16 Mars, 1799.

Le ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique a reçu la note de leurs excellences, en date du 19ème Février, accompagnée de la copie de leur pleinpouvoir, et du projet de traité qu'elles ont bien voulu lui envoyer. Il s'empresse d'y répliquer par quelques observations, en faveur desquelles il sollicite la même indulgence que leurs excellences ont montrés pour ce qu'il a jusqu'ici eu l'honneur de leur représenter à ce sujet.

L'ancien traité de 1785 fut redigé et signé en originel dans les deux langues, Françoise et Angloise, ce que le soussigné espère que leurs excellences consentiront à faire également pour le nouveau. Fondé sur cette attente, il a l'honneur de leur remettre maintenant le projet du traité en langue Angloise, dans lequel il a repété les termes de l'ancien traité dans tous les articles où le projet de leurs excellences a conservé les termes du François, à l'exception de deux changemens peu considérables que les changemens dans la constitution des Etats Unis, survenus depuis la signature du traité de 1785, rendent nécessaires; l'une dans le préambule du traité, l'autre dans le quatrième article.

Quand aux nouveaux articles, le soussigné a généralement fait une traduction de ceux dans le projet que leurs excellences lui ont communiqué. Il croiroit mal répondre à la complaisance qu'elles ont montré dans tout le cours de cette négociation, non moins qu'au vœu de son Gouvernement de prouver sa déférence aux désirs de Sa Majesté Prussienne, s'il insistoit davantage sur l'article de la contrebande; en conséquence, il a entièrement adopté les dispositions à cet égard contenues dans le projet de leurs excellences.

D'après les mêmes principes, il n'a pas hesité d'adopter, à l'égard des reprises maritimes, celui des alternatifs proposés par leurs excellences, qui se trouve sanctionné par l'approbation et la préférence de Sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, persuadé que son Gouvernement se fera gloire de participer aux sentimens d'humanité qui ont dicté cette préférence. Il s'est donc permis de remplir, dans ce sens, l'article XXI, et en même tems de faire un changement nécessaire au dix-septième article, pour le rendre conforme à cet arrangement.

Il a pris encore la liberté de proposer quelques additions et changemens, marqués dans la marge du projet de leurs excellences, qu'il désire leur faire agréer, et dont il a l'honneur de leur exposer les motifs.

Le terme de " hautes," ajouté aux parties contractantes, ne se trouve pas dans les articles copiés de l'ancien traité. On propose de l'effacer dans les nouveaux articles, pour donner de l'uniformité à l'ensemble, et parceque les Etats Unis, n'ayant adopté aucun titre de grandeur, ne se sont jamais appliqué cet épithète dans aucunc de leurs traités.

Dans l'article XIII, les termes de " ci-devant appellés" ne semblent plus devoir appartenir aux articles de contrebande, puisque l'article même contient une liste de contrebande actuelle; c'est pourquoi on propose de les effacer.

Dans l'article XIV, on voudroit ajouter que la certe-partie, ou les connoissemens, aussi bien que le rôle d'équipage, seront accompagnés de certificats par les officiers publics accoutumés pour donner à ces papiers un dégré d'authenticité, que sans eux ne peuvent avoir des documens passés simplement entre des individus. Le soussigné croit même que ces certificats sont d'usage dans les états Prussiens, et que leurs excellences ont entendu les comprendre dans les mots mêmes de connoissemens, et de " rôle d'équipage." Mais comme ces certificats ne sont pas essentiellement partie de ces papiers, et comme ils ne sont nécessaires que dans le tems de guerre maritime, il vau-drait peut-être mieux les nommer expressément. Une autre raison qui rende ces certificats nécessaires, c'est que très communément à bord des navires Americains les connoissemens ne désignent que les ballots, ou caisses, avec leurs marques et numéros, sans en spécifier le contenu, comme l'exige les lois Prussiennes des navigateurs de ce pays.

Le projet du soussigné a varié un peu la clause qui donne un délai de trois mois aux navigateurs pour se procurer les documens nécessaires en tems de guerre. Il n'exige ces documens que pour les navires qui auront fait voile des ports de la Puissance neutre plus de trois mois après que le Gouvernement neutre ait connoissance de la guerre. Parceque, d'un côté, le navire pourroit se trouver en mer beaucoup plus que trois mois après la déclaration de guerre sans posséder ces documens, s'il etoit sorti du port neutre avant ou peu après cette déclaration; et de l'autre, l'intention des parties contractantes n'est pas d'exempter les navires neutres de la production de tout document qui puisse constater leur neutralité, (exemption dont les ennemis de la partie belligérante pourroient abuser, en la reclamant sans y avoir le droit,) mais d'admettre pour les bâtimens qui sont dans l'impossibilité d'être pourvus des documens spécifiés toute autre preuve raisonnable et équivalente.

Dans l'article XV, on voudroit omettre la stipulation que les vaisseaux de guerre n'approcheront les navires neutres, qu'au delà de la portée de canon. Cet engagement, commun à beaucoup de traités modernes, n'est que très rarement, pour ne pas dire jamais, observé. Il seroit souvent impossible, et toujours très incommode, aux deux vaisseaux de l'observer. Dans les gros tems on pourroit rarement envoyer un bateau à la distance qu'il le faudroit pour rester hors de la portée du canon. Dans les tems moderés, il fauderoit que les deux vaisseaux s'arrétassent pendant la traversée du bateau entr'eux, ce qui causeroit une perte inutile de tems, et au vaisseau de la partie belligérante, et au navire neutre; d'ailleurs, en se liant à cette stipulation envers les neutres, on s'y lie dans le fait envers l'ennemi, puisque rien n'est plus ordinaire aux bâtimens des belligérans que d'arborer le pavillon neutre pour échapper à l'ennemi. Or, pour observer cette clause, il faudroit qu'un vaisseau armé cessât la poursuite de tout navire que hisseroit le pavillon neutre pour en rester hors de la portée de canon jusqu'à ce qu'il ait envoyé son bateau pour examiner les papiers du pretendu neutre, ce qui faciliteroit infiniment son evasion.

Dans le même article XV, les mots "passeports et documens" semblent mieux convenir que ceux de "lettres de mer et passeports" adoptés de l'ancien traité, qui n'exigeoit pas les autres documens designés dans le nouveau.

Dans l'article XVI, pour eviter la construction possible que les navires de l'une des parties dans les ports de l'autre seroient sujets à l'embargo pour être employés à quelque usage particulier, on propose, au lieu des mots "public ou particulier" de substituer les mots "que ce soit."

A l'article XIX, on a ajouté une clause pour le faire conformer aux traités subsistans entre les Etats Unis et la Grande Bretagne, dont le soussigné a fait mention dans sa note à leurs excellences du 11ème Juillet de l'année dernière.

En soumettant tout ceci à la considération de leurs excellences, il ajoute que lorsqu'elles en auront decidé, si elles trouvent bon de signer le traité dans les deux langues, il en fera faire copie double de l'originel en Anglois, pour être prête au moment où il leur conviendra de procéder à l'échange des pleinpouvoirs et à la signature.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

A leurs Excellences Messieurs les MINISTRES D'ETAT, &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Adams to the Ministers of Prussia.

BERLIN, March 16, 1799.

The minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America has received the note of their excellencies, dated the 19th February, accompanied by a copy of their full power, and the project which they have been pleased to transmit. He hastens to make some observations in reply, for which he solicits the indulgence they have been kind enough to extend to his previous representations on the same subject.

The ancient treaty of 1785 was concluded and signed, as an original, in two languages, the French and English; and the undersigned hopes that the new treaty will be executed in the same manner. Relying on this expectation, he has now the honor to transmit the project in the English language; in which he has repeated the terms of the ancient treaty, in every article where the project of their excellencies has preserved the French terms, with the exception of two inconsiderable changes, rendered necessary by the alterations in the constitution of the United States: the one in the preamble, the other in the fourth article.

As to the new articles, a translation has generally been made by the undersigned, in the project which their excellencies have communicated. He would, in his opinion, very ill return the courtesy which he has received in the course of this negotiation, and not less imperfectly exhibit the deference which his Government has desired him to manifest towards His Prussian Majesty, if he insisted further on the article of contraband. He has, therefore, in this respect, adopted entirely the provisions contained in the project of their excellencies.

Upon the same principle, he has not hesitated to adopt, in relation to maritime re-captures, the alternative of those proposed by their excellencies, which he finds has been sanctioned by the approbation and preference of His Majesty the King of Prussia; being persuaded that his Government will do itself the honor of participating in those sentiments of humanity which have dictated that preference.

The term "high," applied to the contracting parties, is not found in the articles copied from the ancient treaty. It is proposed to erase it from the new articles, not only for the sake of uniformity, but because the United States, having declined the adoption of any title of distinction, have never applied this epithet in any of their treaties.

In the thirteenth article, the terms "heretofore called" do not appear to apply apporpriately to the articles of contraband; since the article itself contains a list of what is contraband. On that account it is proposed to expunge them.

In the fourteenth article, it is wished to add, that the charter-party, or bill of lading, as well as the muster-roll, shall be accompanied by the certificates of the public officers who are accustomed to issue them, in order to give to these papers a degree of authenticity, without which no documents would be entitled to credit, even in the private transactions of individuals. The undersigned believes that these documents are in use within the Prussian dominions, and that their excellencies have intended to comprise them within the words "bills of lading," and "muster-roll." But as these certificates are not an essential part of these papers, and as these papers themselves are only necessary in a time of maritime war, it would perhaps be better to name them expressly. Another consideration appears to render these certificates necessary; the bills of lading, on board of American vessels, very frequently designate only the bales and boxes, with their marks and numbers, without specifying their contents, as is required of Prussian navigators by the laws of this country.

The project of the undersigned has slightly varied the clause which gives to the navigators a delay of three months, in order to procure the documents necessary in time of war. It only exacts these documents from vessels which shall have sailed from the ports of the neutral Power more than three months after the neutral Government has knowledge of the war; because, on the one hand, the vessel may be at sea more than three months after a declaration of war, without possessing these documents, if it shall have sailed from a neutral port before, or a little after this decaration; and, on the other, the intention of the contracting parties is not to exempt neutral vessels from the production of every document that can prove their neutrality; (an exemption which the enemies of the belligerent party may abuse, by demanding it without right,) but to allow the vessels necessarily unprovided with these specified documents every other reasonable and equivalent proof.

In the fifteenth article it may be proper to omit the stipulation that ships of war shall not approach neutral vessels within cannon shot. Although this engagement is frequently to be found among modern treaties, it has been seldom or never observed. It would be always difficult, and sometimes impossible, to observe it. In tempestuous weather a boat could be rarely sent the distance which would be necessary, if the vessel should remain out of cannon's reach. In moderate weather, the two vessels must stop while a boat is passing between them, and this would occasion a useless waste of time, both to the neutral and belligerent vessels: besides, in binding one's self by this stipulation towards a neutral, an obligation is also created in favor of an enemy, since nothing is more usual with belligerent vessels than attempts to escape an enemy under the mask of a neutral flag. But, if this clause were observed, an armed ship would be arrested in the pursuit of every vessel that could raise a neutral flag; and, if a pretended neutral were at liberty to remain out of the reach of cannon while a boat could be sent for the examination of papers, facilities would be given to fraud.

In the same article, the words "passports and documents" seem more proper than "sea-letters and passports," which have been borrowed from the ancient treaty, which does not require the documents designated in the new one.

In the sixteenth article, to avoid the possible construction that the ships of one of the parties in the ports of the other might be subjected to an embargo, for the purpose of being employed on some special occasion, it is proposed to substitute for the words "public or private" the word "whatsoever."

To the nineteenth article a clause has been added, to make it conform to the subsisting treaties between the United States and Great Britain, to which the undersigned referred in his note to their excellencies, dated the 11th July of the last year.

In submitting these remarks to the consideration of their excellencies, he has only to add, that, whenever they shall have decided whether it will be their pleasure to sign the treaty in the two languages, he will cause two copies of the original to be prepared in English, that he may be ready, at the time it may suit their convenience, to proceed to the exchange of the full powers and to the signature.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

To their Excellencies the MINISTERS OF STATE, &c.

No. 147.

Extract of a letter from John Quincy Adams, Minister, &c. at Berlin, to the Secretary of State, dated

"MAY 10, 1799.

"I received a few days since a note from the cabinet ministers, with a new project for a treaty, in which they have complied with all the alterations I had proposed in my last note, excepting in one particular, and for that they offer an expedient, which I think will answer perfectly well the purpose. I have therefore replied, and sent them a draught in our language entirely conformable to their plan; so that, at present, we are fully agreed upon the tenor of the treaty, the several copies of which only remain to be drawn up and signed, which I hope will be done in the course of a month."

BERLIN, le 30 Avril, 1799.

Il nous reste peu de chose à répliquer à la dernière note que Monsieur Adams, ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, nous a fait l'honneur de nous adresser en date du 16 Mars. La plupart des nouveaux changemens qu'il nous a proposés ne présentant point de difficulté essentielle, nous n'avons pas hésité de les adopter selon ses désirs, à la seule exception de l'article XIV, où il etoit question de stipuler, "qu'en tems de guerre les certe-parties, les connoissemens, et les rôles d'équipage seroient expédiés par les magistrats ou officiers publics du lieu d'où le navire aura mis à la voile."

Les renseignemens que nous avons retirés sur cette matière nous prouvent, que dans quelques unes de nos provinces on est déjà depuis longtems dans l'habitude d'expédier judiciairement les papiers de mer ci-dessus nommés; mais, en d'autres endroits, nos negocians et nos propriétaires de vaisseaux se contentent de passer leurs contrats ou devant un notaire, ou devant un commissaire de justice, ou quelquefois même sous seing privé; et ils sont d'autant plus les maitres de suivre à cet égard les usages reçus et leurs convenances, qu'il n'existe aucune loi, ni du Souverain, ni des tribunaux maritimes, qui les oblige à des formalités rigoureuses. Il ne nous appartiendroit donc pas d'imposer aux sujets du Roi une nouvelle gêne, qui seroit contraire à leurs droits et à leurs priviléges; et tout ce que nous avons pû faire pour nous rapprocher des idées de Monsieur Adams, c'est d'ajouter à l'article XIV, "que les documens seront toujours expédiés dans la forme établie à l'endroit d'où le navire aura mis à la voile."

Il sera le premier à reconnoitre que nous ne saurions aller plus loin, et nous en appellons à cette équité dont il nous a donné tant de preuves satisfaisantes dans tout le cours de nôtre négociation.

Tout le reste du traité est conforme à ses vœux, et nous supposons qu'il ne trouvera plus rien à réléver dans le sécond projet que nous lui communiquons ci-joint. Seulement nous le prierons de le faire collationner encore une fois avec la traduction Angloise également ci-annexe, et dechanger dans celle-ci, d'après le texte François, le passage refait de l'article XIV.

Peut-être sera-t il nécessaire aussi de retoucher la dernière période de ce même article, ainsi que les articles XVII, XIX, et XXI, pour les assimiler davantage aux expressions et aux tours de phrase dont nous nous sommes servis dans l'original.

Après que Monsieur Adams aura eu la complaisance de nous renvoyer les deux exémplaires, nous ne tarderons pas de faire expédier l'instrument du traité en double, et chacun dans les deux langues; et rien ne nous empechera plus ensuite de procéder avec lui à la signature.

[TRANSLATION.]

BERLIN, April 30, 1799.

In the reply we have now to make to the note of Mr. Adams, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, dated the 16th of March, but few observations will be necessary.

The greater part of the alterations which he has recently suggested present no essential difficulty. We have, therefore, unhesitatingly adopted them, in conformity with his desire. The only exception is in the fourteenth article, in which he proposes to stipulate "that, in times of war, the charter-parties, bills of lading, and lists of the ship's company, shall be issued by the magistrates or public officers of the place from whence the ship shall have sailed." We are informed, from the statements with which we have been furnished on this subject, that, in some of our provinces, the practice has prevailed for a long time, to issue the above named sea-papers judicially; but that, in others, our merchants and owners of vessels are content with making their contracts before a notary or a commissary of justice, and sometimes even under a private seal; and they are, in this respect, the more enabled to follow the established usages and consult their own convenience, inasmuch as there is no law enacted by the Sovereign, or recognized by the maritime tribunals, which has required of them more rigorous formalities. It is not, therefore, within our competency to impose on the subjects of the King a new restraint, which would conflict with their rights and privileges; and the nearest approximation which we can make to the views of Mr. Adams is, to add to the fourteenth article "that the documents shall always be issued in the form established at the place from whence the ship shall have sailed." He will be the first to acknowledge that it is not in our power to go beyond this; and, in justification of our decision, we rely upon that equity of which he has given, in the course of the negotiation, so many satisfactory proofs.

All the residue of the treaty is in conformity with his desires: and we can anticipate no objection to the second project we herewith communicate. We pray him, however, to collate once more the English translation, herewith also transmitted, and to charge the latter, in the passage redrawn in the 14th article, according to the alteration in the French text.

Perhaps, also, it will be necessary to retrench the last period of the same article, as well as the 17th, 19th and 21st articles, to assimilate them still more to the expressions and phraseology which we have adopted in the original.

After Mr. Adams shall have had the goodness to return these two copies, we will not delay the conclusion of the treaty in duplicates, each in the two languages; and nothing will afterwards prevent our proceeding with him to the signature.

To Mr. ADAMS, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Le ministre plénipotentiare des Etats Unis d'Amérique a l'honneur de remettre à leurs excellences le nouveau projet de traité qu'elles ont bien voulu lui envoyer, avec un exemplaire en langue Angloise, qu'il y a rendu entièrement conforme.

En adoptant, sans hésiter, tous les changemens que leurs excellences ont cru necessaires, tant à l'egard des papiers stipulés par l'art. XIV, qu'au tour de phrase dans les art. XVII, XIX, and XXI, il se bornera à remarquer seulement que dans son projet, pour désigner la modification qui termine l'art. XIX, il s'etoit servi des expressions précises du traité entre les Etats Unis et la Grande Bretagne, et comme c'est l'étendue de l'engagement contracté par le traité antérieur, qui doit nécessairement servir de mesure à celle de la modification actuelle, il s'entend que le changement de phrase, à cet article, n'en fait pas dans le sens.

Il sera dès à présent prêt à signer le traité aussitôt que les exemplaires en seront expediés, et au moment que leurs excellences lui feront l'honneur de lui indiquer.

Mr. Adams to the Ministers of Prussia.

BERLIN, May 4, 1799.

The minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America has the honor to return to their excellencies the new project of the treaty which they have been pleased to transmit to him, with the copy in English, which has been made to conform to it throughout.

In adopting, without hesitation, all the changes which their excellencies have thought necessary, as well in relation to the papers stipulated by the 14th article, as to the phraseology of the 17th, 19th, and 21st articles, he will confine himself to the single remark that, in his project, in order to designate the modification at the close of the 19th article, he has used the precise expressions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain; and as it is the extent of the engagement formed by a previous treaty, which ought to serve as the measure of its actual modification, he understands that the change of phraseology, in this article, will occasion no difference in its meaning.

He will be ready to sign the treaty as soon as the copies shall be prepared, and at whatever moment their excellencies may signify their wishes.

No. 150.

BERLIN, July 13, 1799.

SIR:

I have the honor to send with this, the two originals in the French language and our own, of the treaty of amity and commerce between His Majesty the King of Prussia, and the United States, signed on the 11th instant.

I am, with great respect, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

IMPRESSED AMERICAN SEAMEN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 11, 1799.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 9, 1799.

SIR:

In pursuance of the "Act to revive and continue in force certain parts of the 'Act for the relief and protection of American seamen,' and to amend the same," I have the honor to lay before Congress abstracts of all the returns made to me by the collectors of the different ports, of registered seamen,* and of impressed seamen; and a report, exhibiting abstracts of the communications received from the agents employed by virtue of that act,

And am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

* For registered seamen, see Commerce and Navigation, No. 48.

Report of the Secretary of State on the communications from the agents employed under the act for the relief and protection of American Seamen.

DAVID LENOX, ESQ., the Agent in Great Britain.

By this statement, dated July 12th, 1797, and laid before Congress on the 27th of February, 1798, it appeared that applications had been made, at different times, to the Lords of the Admiralty, by Mr. Pinckney and Mr. King, the ministers of the United States to His Britannic Majesty, for the release of four hundred and one American seamen, who had been impressed and detained on board his ships of war; and that the applications for their release had been renewed by the agent. It was also therein noted, that some few of them had been discharged. His subsequent applications, added to the former, make a total of six hundred and fifty-one, on the 1st of January, 1799; of whom he gives the following details:

Discharged,	173
Ordered to be discharged, and are supposed to be so,	99
Detained, having no documents to prove their citizenship,	172
Entered and have received the bounty, [and whom, therefore, the Admiralty will not release]	93
Detained as British subjects,	29
Not on board the ships represented,	22
Run, [made their escape]	17
Not answering description in their certificates,	2
Detained as prisoners of war, having been taken on board French armed ships,	8
On board ships on foreign stations, which will be renewed when the ships are accessible,	3
Dead, (Robert Swan,)	1
Sent on board by the civil power,	1
Cases unanswered, which have been renewed, and the result will appear in future abstracts,	31
Total,	651

"NOTE. Besides the above eight cases of men, detained as prisoners of war, many others are confined in different prisons in England, but as the British Government refuse to release them but by exchange, no future application can, with propriety, be made by me."

On the agent's return of December 13th, 1797, he made this note: "Those ordered to be discharged are supposed to be so generally, as there has been but one instance of a second application." And, on his return of March 1st, 1798, that "four men had been discharged, who were taken on board the Dutch fleet in the action with Admiral Duncan, and not included in that return."

His returns from the 1st of January to the 1st of August, 1799, exhibit the following result:

New applications in those seven months for two hundred and sixty-eight seamen, of whom are discharged	26
Ordered to be discharged, and supposed to be so,	55
Detained, having no proof of their citizenship,	73
Entered and have received the bounty,	31
Detained as British subjects,	15
Not on board the ships represented,	12
Run, [made their escape,]	9
Dead, 1; killed in action, 1,	2
On board ships on foreign stations,	5
Taken on board of French privateers,	2
Cases unanswered	38

REMARKS.—The candor with which Major Lenox has conducted his agency has entitled him to attention; and he repeatedly states that he has uniformly experienced a readiness in obtaining the discharge of our seamen, when he could accompany his applications with proofs of their citizenship. Those destitute of such proofs he has advised to write to their friends in America, to procure them, promising to forward their letters free of expense; but says, "It is astonishing how few have availed themselves of this advice; and from which it may reasonably be inferred that there are many of them who have no just claim to our interference:" adding, however, that there is no doubt that many of them are our citizens; and that, to facilitate the obtaining of proofs, he had endeavored to ascertain the States to which they said they belonged. These lists I caused to be printed, and sent to the collectors of the customs, in the different ports, to be exhibited to the merchants, and others concerned in shipping, resorting to their offices, as the channel through which the proofs were most likely to be obtained; but the number of cases for which proofs have in consequence thereof been furnished has been extremely small.

In June, 1798, he remarked, that many of our seamen were then possessed only of certificates from notaries, which were not regarded; while those from the collectors were generally respected. And in January, 1799, he says: "I conceive it proper to mention that I have obtained the discharge of many of our citizens who were not in "possession of documents; and this must be attributed to the candor of the officers who reported the cases to the "Admiralty." He adds: "I also take pleasure in mentioning, that I am well convinced that Board have not a "wish to detain one of our seamen entitled to our protection." On the other hand, on the 1st of August, 1799, he writes: "You will perceive that my official business has not diminished; and, as I have before observed, there is "not the smallest prospect of it while the war continues. Custom-house protections continue to be generally "regarded; but I have many instances to the contrary: for, when ships of war are in want of hands, some of the "captains pay little regard to them. However, I continue to experience great candor and attention to my appli-"cations at the Admiralty. Much of our difficulties arises from the neglect of our captains in not seeing that their "men are possessed of proper certificates; and the consequence is, that scarcely a man without them escapes im-"pressment."

The agent, in June, 1798, wrote as follows: "A very great proportion of our seamen, who are taken in our ves-"sels by the French, enter on board their privateers; but as this [the British] Government detain them as prison-"ers of war, and the French will not be very anxious to exchange them, the evil will, perhaps, be soon remedied. "I have informed them that no application will be made by me without the most satisfactory proofs of their having "been forced into that service."

MR. HENRY CRAIG.

An American merchant residing in Martinico, and executing the office of Agent for the Windward Islands' station, has continued the favorable reports made by Captain Talbot, of the obliging demeanor of the British Admiral Harvey, and ready attention to all his applications for the release of American seamen found impressed on board the ships under his command. In his letter of January 31st, 1798, Mr. Craig says: "I have had the most prompt assistance from Rear Admiral Harvey in all cases of application for the release of an American citizen; and he has given positive instructions, to the respective commanders in his squadron, not to impress a citizen of the United States, where such can be designated."

He says also, that, among the great number of French prisoners brought into Martinico, were often found some Americans, who had transgressed the laws of the United States, forbidding their citizens to enter on board any privateer employed to cruise upon the subjects, citizens, or property, of any Prince or State, with whom the United States were at peace, or upon the citizens of the United States or their property; and that he had recommended to Admiral Harvey to detain them as prisoners, and as men guilty of a high offence against their native country.

On the 24th of April, 1798, he writes, "I am happy to inform you that no instance of impressing an American has taken place for some time;" and hazards an assurance that few or none will take place in future. And in a subsequent letter of October 24th, 1798, he says, that no instance of impressing an American seaman had occurred for the last sixteen months.

SILAS TALBOT, ESQ., Agent in the West Indies.

In his letter of December 15th, 1797, from Jamaica, he represents the situation of American seamen in the squadron under the command of Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, as peculiarly grievous, all communication with them being rendered extremely difficult; that, according to the representations of the seamen, there were restraints on their writing letters to him to inform of their situation; some, as they told him on board the Ceres, having been punished for it; and the seamen, generally, who did write to him, earnestly desiring him not to let it be known to their officers, for fear, as they said, of being punished for so doing.

On the 8th of February, 1798, he wrote, that since his last, he had heard of but one man impressed, and he had no protection; but at the same time he says that not one before impressed had been released.

In his letter of April 8th, 1798, he writes as follows: "Nothing new in this quarter has occurred since my last, in the conduct of the British Admirals, and other officers commanding ships and vessels of war, towards American seamen; nor have I heard of a single instance of their directly impressing and detaining any one of them for many months past: but at the same time I must observe, that it is very probable the number of our seamen that are daily detained on board British ships of war are not very much reduced from that which was occasioned by impressing out of American vessels two or three years ago. True, they do not go on board our vessels now as heretofore, and take out our seamen to man their ships; but, unfortunately, circumstances have taken place which seem to facilitate, and, as it were, put our seamen wholly in their power, and enable them to derive from our sailors the same benefit of their services, with some appearance of plausibility. I allude to the very considerable number of our vessels that are retaken by British ships, after having been captured by the French; and also the great number of French privateers that are captured by His Majesty's ships, almost all of which have more or less of our seamen on board at the time of capture, which were taken out of prizes they had made of American vessels. All Americans thus found, either on board recaptured vessels or privateers, go of course directly on board of British ships of war. These unfortunate men, having been carefully examined and plundered by the French crews of all kinds of papers, and most commonly of nearly all their wearing apparel, and sometimes to the bare buff, are of course deprived of what is so valuable to them—their protections; and, being thus stripped of the means of proving the place of their nativity, they are frequently detained, under a doubtful pretext of their being British subjects; though some officers, more liberal and more just than others, will put them on shore to shift for themselves. Another very fruitful means of obtaining our seamen is, by capturing our vessels as prize, under pretence of contraband goods, or covered property, &c. If they take possession of our vessels, with the view of sending them into port as prize, whether the vessels are or are not libelled, the men are once for all forced out of their own vessels, and detained on board the capturing ship, which still continues at sea, by which our seamen are seldom returned to their own vessels."

On the 11th of June (the last letter prior to his recall) he wrote, that "no material change had taken place relative to the treatment of our seamen."

WILLIAM SAVAGE, ESQ.

A merchant and a magistrate at Kingston, in Jamaica, and the present agent of the United States, on the 26th of June, 1799, mentioned that he had received numerous applications for assistance to impressed American seamen, and that he had recently seen Sir Hyde Parker, the admiral commanding on that station, in hopes that some measure might have been adopted for their relief; but that his application was fruitless. He supposed there were then a hundred Americans in the ships of Admiral Parker's squadron, most of whom he understood had protections.

On the 17th of September last he wrote as follows: "I have, on all occasions, given my best advice, and every humane attention has been paid to the American seamen, many of whom have experienced much distress. In my capacity as magistrate, I have been fortunate in liberating many seamen that have been impressed on shore; but when they are once on the water, my power ceases." He adds: "From the best information I have been able to collect, I have reason to believe there are upwards of two hundred and fifty Americans on board the squadron on this station."

Admiral Parker paid no attention to the agent's application on behalf of our impressed seamen; the Admiral having determined, and informed the agent of the determination, that no proofs would be regarded by him, unless specially presented by the American Government through the British minister; nor then, but in the single case of native Americans. Under this determination, there will be detained not only the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, naturalized in the United States since the peace of 1783, but all who, born elsewhere, were then resident in and had become citizens of the United States; also, all foreigners, as Germans, Swedes, Danes, Portuguese, and Italians, who voluntarily serve in the merchant vessels of the United States. And it is a fact that, such foreigners have frequently been impressed, although their languages and other circumstances demonstrated that they were not British subjects.

In the agent's letter of October 12th, he says, "The collectors cannot be too guarded in their examinations of people previous to their obtaining protections; as many British subjects do obtain them, and after their arrival here, ship on board of British vessels, to the very great inconvenience of the captains of American vessels."

The cases of Richard Carter and John Edes, natives of the State of Massachusetts, communicated by Mr. Savage, are too remarkable to be abridged. The annexed depositions furnish all the details, with the proofs necessary to substantiate the facts. It was probably owing to the aggravated sufferings of these men that the writs of habeas corpus, by which they were liberated, were allowed to be served and obeyed: for Admiral Parker, in 1797, by a general order, forbade all the officers under his command to discharge any man in consequence of any writ of habeas corpus, till such writ was referred to him as commander-in-chief. And this order, as appeared in my report of February, 1798, put an end to the discharges of our seamen by virtue of such writs.

Henry Dandelot, mariner, commanding the brig Hopewell, of Philadelphia, being duly sworn, maketh oath, and saith: That, on the sixteenth day of April last, on his voyage from Philadelphia, aforesaid, to the island of Cuba, where he was bound, the said brig was captured by a French privateer, and, about five hours afterwards, re-captured by His Britannic Majesty's ship Surprise, Captain Hamilton: That when he was so captured, five of his crew, to wit:

Thomas Robinson,	a native	of New York,
James Wake,	do.	of Boston,
Thomas Sound,	do.	of Norfolk,
Samuel Espy,	do.	of Philadelphia,
John C. Mulburn,	do.	of Germany,

all subjects of the United States of America, were put on board the privateer: that, on the next night, the said privateer was captured by His said Britannic Majesty's ship Surprise, and, on the eighteenth of the same month, the said brig and privateer were brought into the harbor of Port Royal: that, on their arrival, the said Thomas Robinson, James Wake, Thomas Sound, Samuel Espy, and John C. Mulburn, were pressed on board His said Majesty's ship Surprise, notwithstanding they have regular American protections. And deponent further saith, that he hath made repeated application on board the said ship for the discharge of the said men, but without effect, and that they are detained on board her against their will and consent.

HENRY DANDELOT.

William Tinker, of the parish of Kingston, in the county of Surrey, and island of Jamaica, practitioner in physic and surgery, being duly sworn, maketh oath and saith: That he, this deponent, was, on or about the twentieth day of June, last past, requested, in his professional capacity, to attend an American seaman, named Richard Carter, belonging to a ship called the Pomona, commanded by —— Kennerd, belonging to Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, North America; and this deponent further saith, from the situation in which he found the said Richard Carter, he verily believes he had been very severely beaten some days previous, his blood being very much extravasated, and, from the appearance of the bruises, deponent says it must have been done with a thick rope.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, ss.

Eliphalet Ladd, second mate on board the ship Thomas and Sarah, of Philadelphia, and a native of Exeter, State of New Hampshire, being duly sworn, maketh oath and saith: That on Wednesday last, the twelfth day of June, instant, he came on shore with two seamen belonging to said ship, named John Edes and Israel Randol, in order to land a boat-load of staves; that, having so done, was about to receive a receipt for the same, on the wharf of Messrs. Ballantine Dick & Co. when a press-gang came up, and immediately laid hold of John Edes, who was then standing at the door of the compting-house. Deponent informed the officer commanding the party, whose name, he has been informed, was William Wiseman, that the said Edes was an American subject, that he was born in Boston, and had a protection, which he could produce in a few minutes; the officer said if deponent could show it, Edes should be released; deponent then went on board his ship, and returned with his own and Edes' protection, and, meeting with Charles Haight, merchant, the owner of the Thomas and Sarah, they went to the ordnance wharf, where the press-gang was gone to, and showed Edes' protection to the officer: on his seeing it, he replied he knew nothing about it. Mr. Haight then observed he should seek satisfaction somewhere else: that Mr. Haight, and deponent being about to go away, one of the gang, who is named Moody, observed to the officer if he was going to let that damned rascal go (meaning deponent;) the officer replied no, proceed and take him; which Moody accordingly did, and, with a broad sword, cut deponent on the forehead, and made a wound of three inches: they then took deponent, together with Edes, and conducted them, in different boats, on board the Brunswick man of war; that the boat in which Edes was, made the ship some little time before the one deponent was in, and on deponent's nearing the ship, he heard the cries of a man flogging, and on going up the side of the Brunswick, he perceived Edes, who was crying, and addressing himself to the first lieutenant, a Mr. Harris, saying, here is the mate who can attest to what I have told you. The lieutenant then laying hold of deponent by the arm, said, Go along on the quarter-deck, you damned rascal; which deponent accordingly did: that all the impressed men were then examined, and afterwards ordered by the lieutenant into the waist; that, when they got there, Edes pulled off his shirt, and showed deponent his back, which was bruised from his shoulders to his hips; he then informed he had been just whipped with ropes'-ends, as deponent was going up the ship's side, by the boatswain and his mate, by orders of the lieutenant: that deponent remained on board the Brunswick all that day and the night, during which period no chirurgical or medical assistance whatever was given to the wound he had received on his head, nor to the bruises of the said Edes, who, during the night, called out several times from extreme pain, and the next morning barely able to move himself; that between nine and ten o'clock the next morning, the whole of the impressed men were again ordered on the quarter deck, and again examined, and stationed, except deponent and Edes; that while the examination was going on, the Captain of the Thomas and Sarah was coming on board, but was prevented by the lieutenant, who ordered the sentinel to keep him off; that about eleven of the clock the captain of the Brunswick came on board, and at three o'clock in the afternoon deponent was discharged, but the said Edes detained.

ELIPHALET LADD.

Sworn before me, one of His Majesty's justices of the peace for the parish of Kingston, this 19th day of June, 1799.

I, Joseph Whipple, collector of the district of Portsmouth in the State of New Hampshire, do hereby certify, that Richard Carter, an American seaman, aged twenty-three years or thereabouts, of the height of five feet ten inches, light complexion, light-brown hair, light colored or blue eyes, was born in Kittery in the State of Massachusetts, has this day produced to me proof, in the manner directed in the act, entitled "An act for the relief and protection of American seamen;" and pursuant to the said act I do hereby certify that the said Richard Carter is a citizen of the United States of America.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal of office, this 2d day of December, A. D. 1796.

Richard Carter, mariner, one of the seamen of and belonging to the ship called the Pomona, of the port of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, one of the United States of North America, being duly sworn, maketh oath and saith, that he, this deponent, was born in Kittery in the State of Massachusetts, in North America, on or about the twelfth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-four, and is a citizen of the United States of North America, and had a regular certificate thereof, signed by the proper officer, a true copy whereof is hereunto annexed; and this deponent saith, on or about the twenty-third day of April last, he shipped as a seaman on board the said ship Pomona, at Portsmouth aforesaid, for a voyage from thence to Jamaica, and back, and accordingly departed in the said ship on the said voyage, and arrived in Kingston, Jamaica, on or about the seventh day of June instant, where the cargo was to be discharged; and this deponent saith, that while he was employed in his duty as a seaman, assisting in discharging the cargo of the said ship Pomona, on the eleventh day of this instant, June, he was taken and seized by a press-gang, belonging to His Britannic Majesty's ship of war the Brunswick, and forcibly carried away, notwithstanding this deponent represented to the officer who commanded the said press gang, that he was an American citizen, and had a regular certificate thereof on board the said ship Pomona; and this deponent saith he was violently forced into a boat and struck twice with a drawn cutlass, by one of the officers with the said press gang, and two men with pistols and hangers placed over this deponent, who loaded their pistols in the presence of deponent, and threatened to blow out his brains if he attempted to move or to speak; and then they carried this deponent, and also John Edes, one of the seamen of the ship Thomas and Sarah, an American citizen whom they had also seized, on board the said ship of war the Brunswick: and this deponent saith, on getting on board the Brunswick, this deponent, and the said John Edes, were ordered to go on the quarter deck, where Mr. Harris, the first lieutenant of the said ship, abused this deponent and the said John Edes, and gave them in charge to the master of the said ship, while he went to look for the boatswain's mate, and soon after returned with the boatswain's mate, whom he ordered to take this deponent and the said John Edes, and to beat them; in obedience to which orders, the said John Edes and this deponent were severely beaten, particularly this deponent, the said boatswain's mate doubling a rope of about three inches and an half thick, and beating this deponent with great violence over the head, face, neck, shoulders, back, and stomach, until he had tired himself, and then he gave the same rope to one of the mariners of the said ship Brunswick, and he also severely beat this deponent in the same manner; and this deponent saith, he received upwards of a hundred blows, and was thereby greatly bruised, and his face cut, and his stomach as well externally as internally much injured, so that this deponent brought up a quantity of blood for several days after; and this deponent saith, that notwithstanding he had been so cruelly treated, he was compelled to assist in hoisting in the boats belonging to the said ship; and this deponent saith, that Nathaniel Kennerd, the master of the said ship Pomona, immediately after this deponent was seized by the press gang, went to the said ship Brunswick, and arrived on board just before this deponent; and the said Nathaniel Kennerd took with him the certificate of this deponent being an American citizen, and submitted the same to the said Lieutenant Harris; and this deponent saith, he did not give any provocation or commit any offence whatever to authorize or induce the treatment which he received as above stated; and this deponent saith, he was forcibly detained on board the said ship Brunswick for the space of ten days, when he was brought back to the Pomona, in consequence of a writ of habeas corpus having been sued forth on behalf of this deponent.

6th CONGRESS.] No. 157. 1st SESSION.

TUNIS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 13, 1799.

UNITED STATES, December 13, 1799.

In conformity with your recommendation, expressed in your resolution of March 6, 1798, I have entered into a friendly negotiation with the Bey and Government of Tunis on the subject of the fourteenth article of the treaty of peace and friendship between the United States and that Power. The result of that negotiation I now lay before the Senate, for their consideration.

JOHN ADAMS.

Extract from the instructions of Richard O'Brien, William Eaton, and James Leander Cathcart, appointed to negotiate alterations of the Treaty with Tunis.

By the powers herewith delivered to you from the President of the United States of America, you are authorized to confer, negotiate, and conclude, with the Bey and Regency of Tunis on the alterations to be made in the treaty between the United States and that Power, as arranged in the month of August, 1797, by the agency of Joseph Etienne Famin, who was employed by Joel Barlow, Esq. agent and consul general of the United States at Algiers.

The important object of discussion arises out of the fourteenth article of that treaty, of which the following is a translation:

"ARTICLE 14. The citizens of the United States of America who shall transport into the Kingdom of Tunis the merchandise of their country, in the vessels of their nation, shall pay three per cent. duty. Such as may be laden by such citizens, under a foreign flag, coming from the United States or elsewhere, shall pay ten per cent. duty. Such as may be laden by foreigners on board of American vessels, coming from any place whatever, shall also pay ten per cent. duty. If any Tunisian merchant wishes to carry merchandise of his country, under any flag whatever, into the United States of America, and on his own account, he shall pay three per cent. duty."

This article is subversive of our great revenue system: it is, besides, without reciprocity. It cannot be important to the Bey and Regency, though ruinous to us.

The revenues of the United States arise chiefly from duties on goods imported. These duties generally exceed ten per cent. They are imposed on our own merchants, and increased on the merchants of foreign nations. Our treaties with those nations stipulate that no higher duties shall be paid by their subjects than by those of the most favored nation. Consequently, if this article in the treaty with Tunis should be ratified by the American Government, the duties on all the goods imported into the United States by the subjects of those foreign nations must be reduced to three per cent. This would necessarily involve the reduction of the duties on goods imported in our own vessels, or our whole navigation would sink under the unequal burthen. This sacrifice, then, it is impossible to make. We should thereby deprive ourselves of the means of supporting our own Government, of paying our public debts, and even of fulfilling our engagement with the Bey and other Barbary Powers. While no advantage would arise to the Bey and his proper subjects, probably a few European and Jewish merchants, settled at Tunis, would alone be benefited.

For these reasons, the President cannot apprehend any difficulty in your obtaining the Bey's consent to abolish the fourteenth article before mentioned. In its place may be substituted a stipulation that the commerce of the United States with Tunis, and of Tunis with the United States, should be on the footing of the commerce of the most favored nations, for the time being, respectively. At all events, the fourteenth article must be rejected, if war should be the consequence. This evil, however, by every soothing and persuasive measure, you will endeavor to prevent. Should it, nevertheless, be insisted on, it will evidently be for the purpose of extorting further stipulations for the delivery of money or stores; but the demand must be resisted. As the article is destitute of any reasonable foundation, without a precedent in any treaty with any other Barbary Power, and strikingly wanting in reciprocity, a submission to it would be dishonorable to the United States. If, to prevent a war, any thing should be added to the very burthensome contract already made, that addition should not have any reference to the fourteenth article, but be stipulated at large, on the conclusion of the new article or articles which you may negotiate.

The Senate have advised the ratification of the treaty, with the exception of the fourteenth article alone; but the eleventh and twelfth articles are objectionable. In firing salutes in the ports of the two Powers reciprocally, to return gun for gun will be proper; but, as the Tunisian vessels of war would probably never enter the ports of the United States, while the vessels of war of the latter were likely often to enter the ports of Tunis, to stipulate for the donation of a barrel of powder for every gun which shall be required for the salute, was to authorize the levying of a contribution in a way not very honorable on either side. It will, therefore, be desirable to expunge this stipulation, and to confine this article to mutual salutes, gun for gun; and it will be very well to limit the number to fifteen, the federal salute. The twentieth article of the treaty with Algiers requires a mutual salute of twenty-one guns; and, if there be any motive to induce the Bey of Tunis to require a salute of more than fifteen guns, the number may be increased to twenty-one. If, nevertheless, the Bey should persist in claiming a barrel of powder for every gun fired in his ports, for a salute to a vessel of war of the United States, then it will be of more consequence to limit the number of guns to at least fifteen, and at most to twenty-one.

In the twelfth article it is stipulated that "the subjects or citizens of the two nations shall be protected by the government or commandants of the places where they may be, and not by the other authorities of the country." This is not very intelligible: possibly it may mean that the officers on the spot shall furnish such protection, without obliging the citizens of the United States in the Tunisian dominions, or the subjects of Tunis in the United States, to seek it at a distance, if the seat of Government be distant; but, if such protection be withheld by subordinate officers, the persons needing protection ought not to be forbidden to resort for justice to the chief authority in each nation. But the clause most objectionable in this article is that which permits the Government of Tunis to compel an American captain to put his vessel into its service at such freight as the Government itself shall prescribe. This will put it into the power of any merchant resident at Tunis, who has the ear of the Bey or of one of his chief officers, to command the service of American vessels for compensations wholly inadequate and unreasonable. The fourteenth article of the treaty with Algiers is proper and honorable: "Should the Dey want to freight any American vessel in the Regency or Turkey, said vessel not being engaged, in consequence of the friendship subsisting between the two nations, he expects to have the preference given him, on his paying the same freight offered by any other nation."

The three articles in question may be changed into the following forms:

"ARTICLE 11. When a vessel of war of one of the parties shall enter a port of the other in which there is a fortification, she shall be saluted with fifteen guns, which salute the vessel of war shall return, gun for gun."

ARTICLE 12. The first part may stand as it is as far as the words (in the English translation,) "which may extend to merchant vessels, but not to those of war;" after which the article may be thus continued: "The subjects and citizens of the two nations, respectively, shall be protected, in the places where they may be, by the officers of the Government there existing; but, on failure of such protection, and for redress of every injury, the party may resort to the chief authority in each country, by whom adequate protection and complete justice shall be rendered."

"In case the Government of Tunis shall have need of an American vessel for its service, such vessel being within the Regency, [and not previously engaged,] the Government shall have the preference, on its paying the same freight as the Tunisian merchants usually pay for the same service, or at the like rate, if the service be without a customary precedent." The words, in brackets, [and not previously engaged] if objected to, may be omitted.

"ARTICLE 14. All vessels belonging to the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall be permitted to enter the different ports of the kingdom of Tunis, and freely trade with the subjects and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties that are paid by all other nations at peace with the Regency. In like manner, all vessels belonging to the subjects and inhabitants of the kingdom of Tunis shall be permitted to enter the different ports of the United States, and freely trade with the citizens and inhabitants thereof, on paying the usual duties that are paid by all other nations at peace with the United States."

Or, if preferred, the fourteenth article may be in the following form:

"The commerce of the citizens and inhabitants of the United States with the kingdom of Tunis, and of the subjects and inhabitants of the kingdom of Tunis with the United States, shall be on the footing of the most favored nations, for the time being, respectively."

Some such form is indispensable: it is impossible to place the commerce of the Tunisian subjects on a better footing than that of the most favored nation; and there must be an exact reciprocity in the stipulation.

A copy of the act of the Senate on this subject is annexed. By that you will see that an alteration in the fourteenth article only is essential; but you will aim at the proposed alterations in the eleventh and twelfth articles.*

6th CONGRESS.] No. 159. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 7, 1800.

UNITED STATES, February 7, 1800.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In consequence of your request to me, conveyed in your resolution of the 4th of this month, I directed the Secretary of State to lay before me copies of the papers intended. These copies, together with his report, I now transmit to the House of Representatives, for the consideration of the members.

JOHN ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 6, 1800.

The Secretary of State has prepared, as directed, and now respectfully submits to the President of the United States copies of the papers which probably were contemplated by the House of Representatives in their resolve of the 4th instant: although no requisition, as the resolve supposes, has ever been received, nor any communication made to the judge of the district court of South Carolina, concerning any man by the name of Jonathan Robbins. But by the proceedings before that judge, as they have been published, it appears that a seaman named Thomas Nash, the subject of the British minister's requisition, did assume the name of Jonathan Robbins, and make oath "that he was a native of the State of Connecticut, and born in Danbury in that State." The Secretary, therefore, besides the copy of the requisition, and the copies of his letter to the Judge of the District Court of South Carolina, and of the judge's answer, has prepared, and herewith encloses copies of the certificates of the selectmen and town-clerk of Danbury, and extracts of letters from Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, satisfactorily proving, that the Thomas Nash, calling himself Jonathan Robbins, who, on the requisition of the British minister, was delivered up by the judge aforesaid, with the assent of the President of the United States, was not an American citizen, but a native Irishman, who, to his other crimes, added perjury, in the hope thereby to escape the punishment due to piracy and murder. The original certificates of the selectmen and town-clerk of Danbury are in the Secretary's possession; and he has compared the extract of Admiral Parker's letter to Mr. Liston with the original, and the extract of the Admiral's letter to the British consul at Charleston, with the passage as recited in the consul's original letter to Mr. Liston. All which is respectfully submitted.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 1.

Copy of a note from Robert Liston, Esq. Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, to Timothy Pickering, Secretary of State of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA, May 23, 1799.

R. Liston presents his respects to Col. Pickering, Secretary of State.

A seaman of the name of Thomas Nash, having been committed to gaol in Charleston, (South Carolina,) at the instance of His Majesty's consul there, on suspicion of his having been an accomplice in the piracy and murder committed on board His Majesty's ship Hermione, and information of the circumstance having been transmitted to Vice Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, a cutter was despatched to Charleston with an officer on board, to whom the man was well known, in order that his person might be identified, and that he should be carried to the West Indies for trial. But on the application of the consul for the restoration of Nash, in conformity to the treaty of 1794, Judge Bee, and the federal attorney, were of opinion that he could not with propriety be delivered up without a previous requisition on my part made to the Executive Government of the United States. May I therefore, request, sir, that you will be pleased to lay this matter before the President, and procure his orders that the said Thomas Nash be delivered up to justice.

No. 2.

Letter from the Secretary of State to Judge Bee.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, June 3, 1799.

SIR:

Mr. Liston the minister of His Britannic Majesty, has requested that Thomas Nash, who was a seaman on board the British frigate Hermione, and who, he is informed, is now a prisoner in the gaol of Charleston, should be delivered up. I have stated the matter to the President of the United States. He considers an offence committed on board a public ship of war on the high seas to have been committed within the jurisdiction of the nation to whom the ship belongs. Nash is charged, it is understood, with piracy and murder, committed by him on board the above mentioned British frigate, on the high seas, and consequently "within the jurisdiction" of His Britannic Majesty: and therefore, by the 27th article of the treaty of amity with Great Britain, Nash ought to be delivered up, as requested by the British minister, provided such evidence of his criminality be produced, as, by the laws of the United States, or of South Carolina, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of the United States. The President has, in consequence hereof, authorized me to communicate to you "his advice and request" that Thomas Nash may be delivered up to the consul or other agent of Great Britain, who shall appear to receive him.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The Hon. THOMAS BEE, Esq. Judge of the District of South Carolina.

No. 3.

Letter from Thomas Bee, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, July 1, 1799.

In compliance with the request of the President of the United States, as stated in your favor of the 3d ultimo, I give notice to the British consul that, at the sitting of the district court on this day, I would order Thomas Nash, the prisoner charged with having committed murder and piracy, on board the British frigate Hermione, on such strong evidence of his criminality as justified his apprehension and commitment for trial, to be brought before me on habeas corpus, in order to his being delivered over agreeable to the 27th article of the treaty of amity with Great Britain. The consul attended in court and requested that the prisoner should remain in gaol until he had a convenient opportunity of sending him away. I have therefore directed that he remain in prison, until the consul should find it convenient to remove him.

I have the honor to be, &c.

FRANCE.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 14, 1800.

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures beg leave to report, on the subject of the suspension of the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, that the laws which have been enacted for that purpose have been, as far as appears to the committee, faithfully executed in all respects depending on the care of the officers of the United States. It is but too probable, however, that individuals, engaged in pursuit of private commercial advantages, and regardless of the public welfare, have evaded, in many instances, the provisions of those laws. Some observations from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to these practices, and a detail of the cases, which, under the sixth section of the last act of Congress, prohibiting commercial intercourse with France, have been transmitted to that Department, are herewith submitted. The committee, being of opinion that it is expedient further to suspend all commercial intercourse, between the United States and France, have prepared a bill for that purpose, which is also submitted, and, in the opinion of the committee, ought to be enacted without delay.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 23, 1800.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose a statement of all the cases which have been transmitted to this Department for decision, pursuant to the act of Congress passed on the 9th of February, 1799, entiled "An act further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States, and France and the dependencies thereof."

Although this statement contains the substance of the information desired by the committee, and particularly in what manner the power granted by the sixth section of the act has been exercised, yet it may be useful to observe, that the law of Congress passed on the 13th of June, 1798, which imposed the first restrictions on commercial intercourse with France, was, by this Department, understood to declare the following principles, by which the conduct of the collectors of the customs has accordingly been governed.

1st. That all exports to France or her dependencies were prohibited after the 1st day of July, 1798, except the goods and effects of Frenchmen residing in the United States, and about to depart in vessels with permits from the President of the United States.

2d. That the entry of vessels bona fide the property of citizens of the United States, or employed by them, and having on board property of such citizens only, was lawful until the 1st day of December, 1798, and no longer.

Although the true interpretation of the law cannot be considered as finally settled by judicial decisions, yet, as diversities of opinion are known to exist, it is desirable that the sense of the Legislature may be ascertained upon the following points, in case the restrictions upon commerce with France shall be continued after the 3d day of March ensuing.

1st. Whether the restrictions shall extend to any, except French and American vessels?

2d. Whether trade through a neutral country, by means of a mutual agent of persons residing in the dominions of France and the United States, shall be lawful?

3d. Whether cartel vessels, with passports of the President of the United States, authorizing the departure of French citizens and their effects, shall be exempted from the restrictions imposed on other vessels?

4th. Whether vessels which may be captured or driven by distress into French ports, the cargoes of which may be seized or detained by the French Government, shall be allowed to receive merchandise or produce in exchange, or compensation for the cargoes so seized or detained.

The following practices have been discovered, and may be expected to increase, in case the law shall not provide a competent remedy.

1st. American citizens have proceeded to the island of St. Thomas, and have there obtained certificates of naturalization for themselves and their vessels; with such vessels a direct trade between the United States and French ports has been attempted to be prosecuted, in the same manner as before the law was passed.

2d. Agents for commercial houses have been established in the island of St. Thomas, and other neutral places, to whom the productions of the United States have been consigned; these productions have been shipped from thence in other American vessels for French ports. The vessels employed between the neutral French ports have been generally covered as Danish property.

3d. Although vessels which have been employed in transporting French citizens and their property from the United States have been carefully restricted by instructions, and by the custom-house inspection, from transporting merchandise on account of persons resident in the United States, yet there is reason to suspect that the intentions of the Government have in some instances been evaded. In case it shall be deemed reasonable to continue the provision for removing French citizens and their property, precise regulations for preventing the vessels from being employed in commerce will be highly necessary.

4th. Vessels have been carried to the vicinity of French ports, where, as is believed, they have been captured by French privateers, in consequence of pre-concerted arrangements: other vessels have entered French ports, on pretence of distress. Although the vessels have in many instances been liberated, yet the cargoes have been detained by order of Government. In some cases, the masters or owners have been permitted to purchase return cargoes; latterly, to strengthen the plea for being admitted to entry in the United States, it has been represented that the masters have been compelled to receive cargoes on board their vessels.

The cases of vessels which have been reported as having been captured by privateers, or driven into French ports in distress, have been attended with particular difficulty. In some instances the representations have, doubtless, been fair and correct; but in others they have unquestionably been collusive and fraudulent. The protests and other papers usually produced by masters of vessels could not, however, furnish the means of a just discrimination.

No effectual remedy is perceived against an abuse which must continue to increase, but by declaring importations from French ports to be unlawful in all cases whatever, without excepting those of vessels really captured or driven into French ports in distress. The capture or arrival in distress may be involuntary, and, therefore, not illegal; but the purchase of a new cargo, or any purchase whatever, except of necessaries to enable the captured persons to return to their own country, ought, as is believed, to be declared unlawful.

It may be said that such a regulation would be odious and severe; that it would be cruel to oblige men to suffer unnecessary losses, or to abandon their property to great risks, when an equivalent was offered. Admitting these objections to have some force, yet it may be observed, with equal truth, that the act prohibiting commercial intercourse ought to be considered, in connexion with other measures, as constituting a part of the system of resistance adopted by the United States; that, prior to the adoption of this system, our vessels were captured and condemned indiscriminately; that the suspension of commerce is a measure which, if well executed, must powerfully influence the conduct of the French colonies; that no system of resistance can be executed without exposing our citizens to some losses; that it is impossible to distinguish cases of real capture or distress from those which are fictitious; that many of our citizens will not make reasonable efforts to avoid being captured or entering French ports, if they find themselves exempted from every loss and inconvenience; that the plea of forcible exchange cannot be admitted without permitting the French Government virtually to repeal our laws, by means of their own internal regulations; and that, if the United States refuse to submit to an insidious policy, and some of our citizens suffer losses, it is against the French and not the American Government that their complaints ought to be directed.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

OLIVER WOLCOTT.

The Honorable SAMUEL SMITH, Esq.
Chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

6th CONGRESS.] No. 161. [1st SESSION.

DIPLOMATIC EXPENDITURES.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 5, 1800.

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred the estimates for the public service of the present year, having observed in those estimates some items under the head of "The Diplomatic Department," which seemed to require further examination, reserved them for the subject of a separate report; which they now beg leave to submit to the consideration of the House.

The items alluded to occur in the following order:

1. "For reimbursing the consuls of the United States, for making and supporting the claims of American citizens to captured property, before the tribunals of foreign countries." The sum estimated for this object is ten thousand dollars.

Two questions occurred to the committee, on this subject.

1. Whether it be proper to make any further allowance of this kind? and

2. Whether, admitting it to be so, the sum estimated be not larger than is necessary? On the first point the committee find that the first and only appropriation for this object, heretofore made by Congress, is contained in the act of April 18th, 1798, (3d volume of laws, 41) in which authority is given, "to reimburse such reasonable advances of money as have been made, or during the present year shall be made, by consuls of the United States, in making and supporting claims of American citizens to captured property, before the tribunals of foreign countries." The committee cannot take upon themselves to say, on what grounds Congress proceeded in making this provision; but they deem the principle, "that the Government ought to support the law suits of its citizens," as altogether inadmissible in itself and highly inexpedient in its consequences. It is an expenditure for the proper direction, application and control whereof, no adequate security can be had; and the very allowance of which invites, and almost impels, to its undue increase by encouraging persons to undertake, upon slight or insufficient grounds, suits whereof they are not to bear the burthen but must reap the gain.

As, however, the former allowance may have led the consuls to suppose that it would be continued, and thereby have induced them to embark in expenses which they would otherwise have avoided, the committee conceive that it would be improper to withhold this allowance too suddenly. They would, therefore, recommend that it be extended to expenses that heretofore have been, or, before a reasonable time for notice to the contrary, may be incurred for the above purpose.

As to the sum necessary for this object, the committee find, by an extract from the accounts in the Secretary of State's office, which has been furnished to them by the Secretary, and is hereto subjoined, (No. 1) that no consuls except those at Alicant, Bourdeaux, and Cadiz, have furnished acounts of expenditures under this head; and that the sum so laid out by them in two years, 1797 and 1798, amounted to something less than eleven thousand dollars. They are, therefore, of opinion that five thousand dollars would be sufficient for the proposed appropriation, which ought to be confined to past transactions; and that a stop should be put to the expense in future.

2. "For reimbursing consuls and others for aid rendered to distressed American seamen in foreign countries, bringing them home from thence, and assistance in the United States." The estimate for this object is thirty thousand dollars.

The committee find that two appropriations have been heretofore made by Congress on this head. The first by the act of April 18th, 1798, and the second by that of March 2d, 1799.

The first of these appropriations was blended with that for the prosecution of claims; and thirty thousand dollars were appropriated for the two objects. The second was distinct, and amounted to twenty thousand dollars.

Under the act of May the 28th, 1796, "for the relief and protection of American seamen," there has been an annual appropriation for four years of fifteen thousand dollars, for the salaries and expenditures of agents appointed pursuant thereto. By an extract from the accounts in the Department of State, which has been furnished to the committee, and is hereto subjoined, (No. 2) it appears that the disbursements of one of these agents residing in London, up to December 1st, 1799, amounted to four thousand four hundred and sixty-four dollars and eleven cents, and that the other, who was sent to the West Indies in 1798, disbursed nine thousand five hundred and seventy-two dollars in the object of his mission.

It further appears, by the extract referred to, that the whole expenditures for this object, except those of the agents in London and the West Indies, amounted, in 1797, to eight hundred and fifteen dollars and seventy cents; and in 1798, to one thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars and twenty-nine cents, and that, in 1799, they rose to twenty-nine thousand and sixty-six dollars and eighteen cents.

This extensive and rapid increase, the committee conceive, must be considered as furnishing a conclusive argument against the measure itself. An expenditure liable to such abuse, and holding out such strong temptations for it, ought to be authorized with very great caution, even if it were justified by proper principles. The committee do not consider it as so justified, nor can they discover any principle of duty or good policy which requires the Government to defray the expenses of every seaman in foreign countries, who chooses to call himself American, to say that he is destitute, and to ask for a passage to the United States. If the experience of the last three years were not conclusive on the point as the committee conceive it to be, still it would be easy to discern the extent to which an expenditure of this kind, if left on the footing of the former appropriations, must be carried.

Cases may no doubt occur in which relief ought to be extended, and the expense reimbursed to those who give it; but those cases, it is conceived, ought to be left to the discretion of Congress on their particular circumstances: and there can be no doubt that, where those circumstances shall be found to have justified an advance the reimbursement will be made.

It is therefore the opinion of the committee, that the appropriation in question ought to be withheld, and that such accounts for disbursements of this kind, as may hereafter be presented, ought to be laid before Congress, in order to be decided on according to the merits of each case.

3. "Costs of prosecuting claims in prize causes, before the high court of admiralty, and courts of appeals in London, for the years 1799 and 1800." The sum estimated for this object is ninety thousand dollars.

The faith of the United States being formerly pledged to answer for the payment of these costs, and Congress having directly sanctioned that measure by the act of March 3d, 1797, assuming the payment, and making an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars therefor, the committee conceive that the propriety of taking the step in the first instance cannot now be inquired into. They have, therefore, confined their attention to the amount which ought now to be appropriated.

On this point they have been informed by the Secretary of State, that the cases in which the United States are pledged for costs, amount to two hundred and ninety-one; the cost of two hundred and thirty-six of which are estimated at two hundred and fifty pounds sterling each; and of fifty-five, at one hundred and fifty pounds sterling each, amounting, in the whole, to sixty-seven thousand two hundred and fifty dollars; of which sum twenty-three thousand six hundred and thirty-five dollars have been paid, leaving a balance of forty-three thousand six hundred and fifteen dollars still to be provided. The committee conceive that it will be unnecessary to extend the appropriation beyond that balance.

This appropriation, with the others which they have thought it proper to recommend, are contained in the bill herewith presented for the consideration of the House. And they have also subjoined a letter from them to the Secretary of State, and his answer, (Nos. 3, 4) as containing matters relative to the subject of their report.

In concluding, they beg leave to state explicitly, that, in recommending it to the House to withhold or curtail the appropriations in question, and in pointing out the inexpediency of measures formerly adopted on that head, they do not mean to imply the slightest censure on the manner in which the business has been conducted by the Department of State. On the contrary, their objections arise from a firm persuasion that it cannot be so conducted as to prevent abuse; and that if it could, still the measures ought to be given up, as being erroneous and inexpedient in their nature and principles.

COMMITTEE ROOM, April 7, 1800.

I am directed, sir, by the Committee of Ways and Means, to resquest that you will be so good as to favor me, as soon as convenient, for their use, with

First, an account, as particular as can be rendered at present, of the expenditure in each year, separately, of all moneys heretofore granted by Congress, and, for defraying the expenses of prosecuting claims in prize causes, before the Courts of Admiralty and Appeal in London, for reimbursing to consuls of the United States, their expenses in making and supporting the claims of American citizens for captured property before foreign tribunals.

And, for reimbursing the said consuls and others, for aid rendered to distressed American seamen in foreign countries.

And for defraying the expenses of bringing home the said seamen, and affording them assistance in the United States.

Secondly, information of the manner in which the accounts of the said expenditures, and each of them, are checked, controlled, and settled.

Thirdly, information how far expenses of any of the aforesaid descriptions may have already been incurred, beyond the former grants therefor.

And how far the faith of Government may be considered as pledged for further expenses under any of the said heads; and,

Fourthly, your opinion how far it is expedient to continue the said expenses, or any of them, beyond the engagements which may have already been contracted.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

ROBERT GOODLOE HARPER.

The Honorable SECRETARY OF STATE.

No. 4.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 14, 1800.

SIR:

In compliance with the desire of the Committee of Ways and Means, expressed in your letter of the 7th instant, I have the honor to enclose two statements, one of expenditures for the relief of American seamen, the other for making and supporting the claims of American citizens for captured property before foreign tribunals.

The enclosed printed copy of a circular letter to our consuls will show what directions have been given relative to the accounts and vouchers for their expenditures.

The expensive prosecution of claims, before the high Court of Admiralty and Court of Appeals in London, comprehends about two hundred and thirty-six cases, the costs of which have been estimated to average two hundred and fifty pounds sterling each:

Amounting to,	£59,000
And fifty-five other cases to average £150	8,250
	67,250
Of which have been paid,	23,635
Leaving to be paid,	£43,615

But on the final settlement of these claims, and payment of decrees and awards in favor of the claimants by the British Government, those costs will be reimbursed. Where the claims are rejected, as the public will have nothing in its hands, the costs in many, perhaps in most, cases, may be lost. Provision for paying the costs in the first instance should doubtless be continued, for the same reason that it was at first made.

Although the appropriation for prosecuting claims before other foreign tribunals, in the act of April 18, 1798, (Laws vol. 4. p. 93.) was expressed to be for expenditures which had been made, or which during that year should be made, by our consuls, and my circular letter adopts the expression yet I conceive they will look to the United States for reimbursing subsequent expenditures; for they cannot suppose, that, when they had incurred expenses by instituting appeals, which remained undecided at the close of 1798, they should immediately relinquish them: on the contrary, they will naturally think that the motives which induced the first provision will lead Congress to continue to provide for the same objects while the same causes remain; that is, while captures continue to be made, and seamen (prisoners, or otherwise distressed,) demand relief.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

ROBERT GOODLOE HARPER, Esquire, Chairman, &c.

† Mr. Iznardy's expenditures exceed the payments made to him. This sum is put down as the proportion of his account (to the amount paid) for the relief of seamen.

LONDON, July 1, 1800.

HENRY CRAIG, Esq. Agent at Martinique.

No communications have been received from him since the last report to Congress.

WILLIAM SAVAGE, Esq. Agent at Jamaica.

The following extracts from his letters exhibit the general nature of the impressments which, during the last year, took place on that station.

JANUARY 30, 1800.

"The impressing of American seamen is rigidly pursued, to the great distress of the American trade."

FEBRUARY 20.

"The American trade, for some months past, has been greatly distressed, in consequence of their seamen being so generally impressed. In many instances, the masters have been necessitated to take people of any nation, and pay the most extravagant wages in advance, or suffer their property to remain here."

AUGUST 21.

"I beg leave to recommend, that the nearest of kin to impressed seamen frame affidavits of their being natives of America, and that the same be sworn to before the Governor, or Chief Justice of the State, accompanied with a certificate from you, or the British consul general, stating that the person administering the oath was authorized so to do. Documents of this nature, I have good reason to think, will induce Lord Seymour, now admiral on this station, to liberate the parties, as he assures me of his disposition to do the strictest justice."

NOVEMBER 1.

"The conduct of the navy here, so far as respects the impressing and detaining American seamen, is widely different, on the score of humanity, from what was pursued during the administration of Admiral Parker."

Mr. Savage has, since the last report to Congress, transmitted lists of impressed seamen, calling themselves Americans, to the number of one hundred and sixty-seven.

Abstract of all the Protests or Affidavits of Masters of Ships and Vessels of the United States, transmitted to the Secretary of State, in pursuance of the fifth section of the "Act for the Relief and Protection of American Seamen," and received since the 9th of December, 1799, the date of his last report to Congress.

6th CONGRESS.] No. 163. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 15, 1800.

UNITED STATES, December 15, 1800.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I transmit to the Senate, for their consideration and decision, a convention both in English and French, between the United States of America and the French republic, signed at Paris on the 13th day of September last, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the two Powers. I also transmit to the Senate, three manuscript volumes containing the journal of our envoys.

JOHN ADAMS.

[The following messages, with the accompanying documents, relating to the same subject, were also transmitted to the Senate.]

UNITED STATES, December 22, 1800.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In conformity with your request, in your resolution of the 19th of this month, I transmit you the instructions given to our late envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French republic.

It is my request to the Senate, that these instructions may be considered in strict confidence, and returned to me as soon as the Senate shall have made all the use of them they may judge necessary.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, January 21, 1801.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In compliance with your request, signified in your resolution of the 20th day of this month, I transmit you a report, made to me by the Secretary of State* on the same day; a letter of our late envoys to him of the 4th of October last; an extract of a letter from our minister plenipotentiary in London to him of the 22d of November last; and an extract of another letter from the minister to the Secretary of the 31st of October last.

The reasoning in the letter of our late envoys to France is so fully supported by the writers on the law of nations, particularly by Vattel, as well as by his great masters, Grotius and Puffendorf, that nothing is left to be desired to settle the point that, if there be a collision between two treaties, made with two different Powers, the more ancient has the advantage; for no engagement contrary to it can be entered into in the treaty afterwards made, and, if this last be found, in any case, incompatible with the more ancient one, its execution is considered as impossible, because the person promising had not the power of acting contrary to his antecedent engagement. Although our right is very clear to negotiate treaties according to our own ideas of right and justice, honor and good faith, yet it must always be a satisfaction to know, that the judgments of other nations, with whom we have connexion, coincide with ours, and that we have no reason to apprehend that any disagreeable questions and discussions are likely to arise. The letters from Mr. King will, therefore, be read by the Senate with particular satisfaction.

The inconveniences to public officers, and the mischiefs to the public, arising from the publication of the despatches of ministers abroad are so numerous, and so obvious, that I request of the Senate that these papers, especially the letters from Mr. King, be considered in close confidence.

JOHN ADAMS.

Convention entre la République Française et les Etats Unis d'Amérique.

Le Premier Consul de la république Française, au nom du peuple Français, et le Président des Etats Unis d'Amérique, également animés du désir de mettre fin aux différends qui sont survenus entre les deux états, ont respectivement nommé leurs plénipotentiaires, et leur ont donné pleinpouvoir pour négocier sur ces différends et les terminer; c'est à dire, le Premier Consul de la république Française, au nom du peuple Français, a nommé pour plénipotentiaires de la dite république, les citoyens Joseph Bonaparte, ex-ambassadeur de la république Française à Rome et conseiller d'état; Charles Pierre Claret Fleurieu, membre de l'Institut National et du Bureau des Longitudes de France, et conseiller d'état, président de la Section de la Marine; et Pierre Louis Rœderer, membre de l'Institut National de France, et conseiller d'état, président de la Section de l'Intérieur; et le Président des Etats Unis d'Amérique, par et avec l'avis et le consentement du Sénat des dits Etats, a nommé pour leurs plénipotentiaires, Oliver Ellsworth, Chef de la Justice des Etats Unis; William Richardson Davie, ci-devant Gouverneur de l'Etat de la Caroline Septentrionale, et William Vans Murray, ministre résident des Etats Unis à la Haye; lesquels, après avoir fait l'échange de leurs pleinpouvoirs, longuement et mûrement discuté les intérêts respectifs, sont convenus des articles suivans:

ARTICLE 1. Il y aura une paix ferme, inviolable, et universelle, et une amitié vraie et sincère, entre la république Française et les Etats Unis d'Amérique, ainsi qu' entre leurs pays, territoires, villes, et places, et entre leurs citoyens et habitants, sans exception de personnes ni de lieux.

The Premier Consul of the French republic, in the name of the people of France, and the President of the United States of America, equally desirous to terminate the differences which have arisen between the two States, have respectively appointed their plenipotentiaries, and given them full powers to treat upon those differences and to terminate the same, that is to say: the Premier Consul of the French republic, in the name of the people of France, has appointed for the plenipotentiaries of the said republic, the citizens Joseph Bonaparte, ex-ambassador at Rome and counsellor of state; Charles Pierre Claret Fleurieu, member of the National Institute, and of the Board of Longitude of France, and Counsellor of State, President of the Section of the Marine; and Pierre Louis Rœderer, member of the National Institute of France, and counsellor of state, President of the Section of the Interior. And the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said States, has appointed for their plenipotentiaries, Oliver Ellsworth, Chief Justice of the United States, William Richardson Davie, late Governor of the State of North Carolina, and William Vans Murray, minister resident of the United States at the Hague; who, after having exchanged their full powers, and after full and mature discussion of the respective interests, have agreed on the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship between the French republic and the United States of America, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree, at present, respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of et de commerce de la même date, et à la convention en date du 14 Novembre, 1788, non plus que relativement aux indemnités mutuellement dues ou réclamées, les parties négocieront ultérieurement sur ces objets, dans un tems convenable: et jusqu'à ce qu'elles se soyent accordées sur ces points, les dits traités et convention n'auront point d'effet, et les relations des deux nations seront réglées ainsi qu'il suit:

ART. 3. Les bâtimens d'états qui ont été pris de part et d'autre, ou qui pourraient être pris avant l'échange des ratifications seront rendus.

ART. 4. Les propriétés capturées et non encore condamnées définitivement, ou qui pourront être capturées avant l'échange des ratifications, excepté les marchandises de contrebande destinées pour un port ennemi, seront rendues mutuellement sur les preuves suivantes de propriété, savoir:

De part et d'autre, les preuves de propriété relativement aux navires marchands, armés ou non armés, seront un passeport de la forme suivante:

"A tous ceux qui les présentes verront, soi notoire: que faculté et permission a été accordée à ——, maitre ou commandant du navire appellé ——, de la ville de ——, de la capacité de —— tonneaux, ou environ, se trouvant présentement dans le port et hâvre de ——, et destiné pour ——, chargé de ——, qu'après que son navire a été visité, et avant son départ, il pretera serment entre les mains des officiers autorisés à cet effet: que le dit navire appartient à un ou plusieurs sujets de ——, dont l'acte sera mis à la fin des présentes; de meme qu'il gardera et fera garder par son équipage, les ordonnances et réglemens maritimes, et remettra une liste signée et confirmée par témoins, contenant les noms et surnoms, les lieux de naissance, et la demeure des personnes composant l'équipage de son navire, et de tous ceux qui s'y embarqueront, lesquels il ne recevra pas à bord sans la connaissance et permission des officiers autorisés à ce; et dans chaque port ou hâvre où il entrera avec son navire, il montrera la présente permission aux officiers à ce autorisés, et leur fera un rapport fidèle de ce qui s'est passé durant son voyage; et il portera les couleurs, armes, et enseignes de la république Française ou des Etats Unis durant son dit voyage. En témoin de quoi, nous avons signé les présentes, les avons fait contresigner par ——, et y avons fait apposer le sceau de nos armes.

Et ce passeport suffira sans autre pièce, non obstant tout réglement contraire. Il ne sera pas exigé que ce passeport ait été renouvellé ou révoqué, quelque nombre de voyages que le dit navire ait pu faire, à moins qu'il ne soit revenu chez lui dans l'espace d'une année.

Par rapport à la cargaison, les preuves seront des certificats contenant le détail de la cargaison, du lieu d'où le bâtiment est parti, et de celui où il va, de manière que les marchandises défendues et de contrebande puissent être distinguées par les certificats; lesquels certificats auront été faits par les officiers de l'endroit d'où le navire sera parti, dans la forme usitée dans le pays; et si ces passeports ou certificats, ou les uns et les autres ont été détruits par accident, ou enlévés de force, leur défaut pourra être supplée par toutes les autres preuves de propriété admissibles d'après l'usage général des nations. Pour les bâtimens autres que les navires marchands, les preuves seront la commission dont il sont porteurs.

Cet article aura son effet à dater de la signature de la présente convention; et si à dater de la dite signature, des propriétés sont condamnées contrairement à l'esprit de la dite convention, avant qu'on ait connaissance de cette stipulation, la propriété ainsi condamnée sera, sans délai, rendue ou payée.

ART. 5. Les dettes contractées par l'une des deux nations envers les particuliers de l'autre, ou par des particuliers de l'une envers des particuliers de l'autre, seront acquittées, ou le payement en sera poursuivi comme s'il n'y avait eu aucune mésintelligence entre les deux états. Mais cette clause ne s'étendra point aux indemnités réclamées pour des captures ou pour des condamnations.

ART. 6. Le commerce entre les deux parties sera libre; les vaisseaux des deux nations, et leurs corsaires, ainsi que leurs prises, seront traités dans les ports respectifs comme ceux de la nation la plus favorisée, et, en général, les deux parties jouiront dans les ports l'une de l'autre, par rapport au commerce et à la navigation, des priviléges de la nation la plus favorisée.

ART. 7. Les citoyens et habitans des Etats Unis pourront disposer, par testament, donation, ou autrement, de leurs biens, meubles et immeubles, possédés dans le teramity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed; the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time; and, until they may have agreed upon these points, the said treaties and conventions shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows:

ART. 3. The public ships which have been taken on one part and the other, or which may be taken before the exchange of ratifications, shall be restored.

ART. 4. Property captured, and not yet definitively condemned, or which may be captured before the exchange of ratifications, (contraband goods destined to an enemy's port excepted,) shall be mutually restored, on the following proofs of ownership, viz: The proof on both sides with respect to merchant ships, whether armed or unarmed, shall be a passport in the form following:

"To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

"It is hereby made known that leave and permission has been given to —— master and commander of the ship called —— of the town of —— burthen —— tons, or thereabouts, lying at present in the port and haven of ——, and bound for ——, and laden with ——, after that his ship has been visited, and before the sailing, he shall make oath before the officers who have the jurisdiction of maritime affairs, that the said ship belongs to one or more of the subjects of ——, the act whereof shall be put to the end of these presents, as likewise that he will keep, and cause to be kept by his crew on board, the marine ordinances and regulations, and enter in the proper office a list, signed and witnessed, containing the names and surnames, the places of birth, and abode of the crew of his ship, and of all who shall embark on board her, whom he shall not take on board without the knowledge and permission of the officers of the marine; and in every port or haven where he shall enter with his ship, he shall show this present leave to the officers and judges of the marine, and shall give a faithful account to them of what passed and was done during his voyage; and he shall carry the colors, arms, and ensigns of the French republic, or the United States, during his voyage. In witness whereof, we have signed these presents, and put the seal of our arms thereunto, and caused the same to be countersigned —— at —— the —— day of —— anno Domini ——."

And this passport will be sufficient without any other paper, any ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding; which passport shall not be deemed requisite to have been renewed or recalled, whatever number of voyages the said ship may have made, unless she shall have returned home within the space of a year. Proof with respect to the cargo shall be certificates, containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place whence the ship sailed, and whither she is bound; so that the forbidden and contraband goods may be distinguished by the certificates, which certificates shall have been made out by the officers of the place whence the ship set sail, in the accustomed form of the country. And if such passport or certificates, or both, shall have been destroyed by accident, or taken away by force, their deficiency may be supplied by such other proofs of ownership as are admissible by the general usage of nations. Proof, with respect to other than merchant ships, shall be the commission they bear.

This article shall take effect from the date of the signature of the present convention. And if, from the date of the said signature, any property shall be condemned, contrary to the intent of the said convention, before the knowledge of this stipulation shall be obtained, the property so condemned shall, without delay, be restored or paid for.

ART. 5. The debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other, or by the individuals of one with the individuals of the other, shall be paid, or the payment may be prosecuted in the same manner as if there had been no misunderstanding between the two states. But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures or confiscations.

ART. 6. Commerce between the parties shall be free. The vessels of the two nations, and their privateers, as well as their prizes, shall be treated in the respective ports as those of the nation the most favored; and, in general, the two parties shall enjoy in the ports of each other, in regard to commerce and navigation, the privileges of the most favored nation.

ART. 7. The citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall be at liberty to dispose, by testament, donation, or otherwise, of their goods, moveable and immoveritoire Européen de la république Française; et les citoyens de la république Française auront la meme faculté à l'égard des biens, meubles et immeubles, possédés dans le territoire des Etats Unis, en faveur de telle personne, que bon leur semblera. Les citoyens et habitans d'un des deux états, qui seront héritiers des biens, meubles ou immeubles, situés dans l'autre, pourront succéder ab intestato, sans qu'ils ayent besoin de lettres de naturalité, et sans que l'effet de cette stipulation, leur puisse être contesté ou empeché, sous quelque prétexte que ce soit; et seront les dits héritiers, soit à titre particulier, soit ab intestato, exempts de tout droit quelconque chez les deux nations. Il est convenu que cet article ne dérogera en aucune manière aux lois qui sont à présent en vigeur chez les deux nations, ou qui pourraient être promulguées à la suite contre l'émigration; et aussi que dans le cas où les lois de l'un des deux états limiteraient pour les étrangers l'exercice des droits de la propriété sur les immeubles, on pourrait vendre ces immeubles, ou en disposer autrement en faveur d'habitans ou de citoyens du pays où ils seraient situés, et il sera libre à l'autre nation d'établir de semblables lois.

Art. 8. Pour favoriser de part et d'autre le commerce, il est convenu que si, ce qu'à Dieu ne plaise, la guerre éclatait entre les deux nations, on allouera, de part et d'autre, aux marchands, et autres citoyens ou habitans respectifs, six mois après la déclaration de guerre, pendant lequel tems ils auront la faculté de se retirer avec leurs effets et meubles qu'ils pourront emmener, envoyer, ou vendre, comme ils le voudront, sans le moindre empechement. Leurs effets, et encore moins leurs personnes, ne pourront point, pendant ce tems de six mois, être saisis; au contraire, on leur donnera des passeports qui seront valables pour le tems nécessaire à leur retour chez eux; et ces passeports seront donnés pour eux, ainsi que pour leurs bâtimens et effets, qu'ils désireront emmener ou envoyer. Ces passeports serviront de sauf-conduit contre toute insulte et contre toute capture de la part des corsaires, tant contre eux que contre leurs effets; et si, dans le terme ci-dessus désigné, il leur était fait par l'une des parties, ces citoyens, ou ces habitans, quelque tort dans leur personnes ou dans leurs effets, on leur en donnera satisfaction complète.

Art. 9. Les dettes dues par des individus de l'une des deux nations aux individus de l'autre, ne pourront, dans aucun cas de guerre, ou de démêlés nationaux, être séquestrées ou confisquées, non plus que les actions ou fonds qui se trouveraient dans les fonds publics, ou dans des banques publiques ou particulières.

Art. 10. Les deux parties contractantes pourront nommer, pour protéger le négoce, des agens commerciaux qui résideront en France et dans les Etats Unis; chacune des parties pourra excepter telle place qu'elle jugera à propos, des lieux où la résidence de ces agens pourra etre fixée. Avant qu'aucun agent puisse exercer ses fonctions, il devra être accepté, dans les formes reçues par la partie chez laquelle il est envoyé; et quand il aura été accepté et pourvu de son exequatur, il jouira des droits et prérogatives dont jouiront les agens semblables des nations les plus favorisées.

Art. 11. Les citoyens de la république Française ne payeront dans les ports, hâvres, rades, contrées, isles, cités, et lieux des Etats Unis, d'autres ni de plus grands droits ou impôts, de quelque nature qu'ils puissent être, quelque nom qu'ils puissent avoir, que ceux que les nations les plus favorisées sont ou seront tenues de payer; et ils jouiront de tous les droits, libertés, privilèges, immunités, et exemptions en fait de négoce, navigation, et commerce, soit en passant d'un port des dits Etats à un autre, soit en y allant ou en revenant de quelque partie ou pour quelque partie du monde que ce soit, dont les nations susdites jouissent ou jouiront. Et réciproquement, les citoyens des Etats Unis jouiront, dans le territoire de la république Française en Europe, des mêmes priviléges, immunités, tant pour leurs biens et leurs personnes, que pour ce qui concerne le négoce, la navigation, et le commerce.

Art. 12. Les citoyens des deux nations pourront conduire leurs vaisseaux et marchandises (en exceptant toujours la contrebande) de tout port quelconque, dans un autre port appartenant à l'ennemi de l'autre nation; ils pourront naviguer et commercer en toute liberté et sécurité, avec leurs navires et marchandises, dans les pays, ports, et places des ennemis des deux parties, ou de l'une ou de l'autre partie, sans obstacles et sans entraves, et non seulement passer directement des places et ports de l'ennemi susmentionnés, dans les ports et places neutres, mais encore de toute place appartenant à un ennemi dans toute autre place appartenant à un ennemi, qu'elle soit ou ne soit pas soumise à la même jurisdiction, à moins que ces places ou ports ne soient réellement bloqués, assiégés, ou investis.

able, holden in the territory of the French republic in Europe, and the citizens of the French republic shall have the same liberty with regard to goods, moveable and immoveable, holden in the territory of the United States, in favor of such persons as they shall think proper. The citizens and inhabitants of either of the two countries, who shall be heirs of goods, moveable or immoveable, in the other, shall be able to succeed ab intestato, without being obliged to obtain letters of naturalization, and without having the effect of this provision contested or impeded, under any pretext whatever; and the said heirs, whether such by particular title, or ab intestato, shall be exempt from every duty whatever, in both countries. It is agreed that this article shall in no manner derogate from the laws which either state may now have in force, or hereafter may enact, to prevent emigration; and also, that, in case the laws of either of the two states should restrain strangers from the exercise of the rights of property with respect to real estate, such real estate may be sold, or otherwise disposed of, to citizens or inhabitants of the country where it may be, and the other nation shall be at liberty to enact similar laws.

Art. 8. To favor commerce on both sides, it is agreed that, in case a war should break out between the two nations, (which God forbid,) the term of six months after the declaration of war shall be allowed to the merchants, and other citizens and inhabitants, respectively, on one side and the other, during which time they shall be at liberty to withdraw themselves, with their effects and moveables, which they shall be at liberty to carry, send away, or sell, as they please, without the least obstruction; nor shall their effects, much less their persons, be seized during such term of six months; on the contrary, passports, which shall be valid for a time necessary for their return, shall be given to them for their vessels and the effects which they shall be willing to send away or carry with them; and such passports shall be a safe conduct against all insults and prizes which privateers may attempt against their persons and effects. And if any thing be taken from them, or any injury done to them, or their effects, by one of the parties, their citizens, or inhabitants, within the term above prescribed, full satisfaction shall be made to them on that account.

Art. 9. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war, or national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

Art. 10. It shall be free for the two contracting parties, to appoint commercial agents for the protection of trade, to reside in France and the United States. Either party may except such place as may be thought proper from the residence of these agents. Before any agent shall exercise his functions, he shall be accepted in the usual forms by the party to whom he is sent; and when he shall have been accepted and furnished with his exequatur, he shall enjoy the rights and prerogatives of the similar agents of the most favored nations.

Art. 11. The citizens of the French Republic shall pay in the ports, havens, roads, countries, islands, cities, and towns of the United States, no other, or greater duties or imposts, of what nature soever they may be, or by what name soever called, than those which the nations most favored are, or shall be obliged to pay, and they shall enjoy all the rights, liberties, privileges, immunities, and exemptions in trade, navigation, and commerce, whether in passing from one port in the said States to another, or in going to and from the same from and to any part of the world, which the said nations do, or shall enjoy. And the citizens of the United States shall reciprocally enjoy in the territories of the French Republic in Europe, the same privileges and immunities, as well for their property and persons, and for what concerns trade, navigation, and commerce.

Art. 12. It shall be lawful for the citizens of either country to sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods always excepted) from any port whatever to any port of the enemy of the other, and to sail and trade with their ships and merchandise, with perfect security and liberty, from the countries, ports, and places of those who are enemies of both, or of either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, and to pass not only directly from the places and ports of the enemy aforementioned, to neutral ports and places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy, to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same power, or under several; unless such ports or places shall be actually blockaded, besieged, or invested.

Et dans le cas, comme il arrive souvent, où les vaisseaux feraient voile pour une place ou port appartenant à un ennemi ignorant qu'ils sont bloqués, assiégés, ou investis, il est convenu que tout navire qui se trouvera dans une pareille circonstance, sera détourné de cette place ou port, sans qu'on puisse le retenir ni confisquer aucune partie de sa cargaison (à moins qu'elle ne soit de contrebande, ou qu'il ne soit prouvé que le dit navire, après avoir été averti du blocus ou investissement, a voulu rentrer dans ce même port;) mais il lui sera permis d'aller dans tout autre port ou place qu'il jugera convenable. Aucun navire de l'une ou de l'autre nation, entré dans un port ou place avant qu'ils ayent été réellement bloqués, assiégés, ou investis par l'autre, ne pourra etre empeché de sortir avec sa cargaison: s'il s'y trouve, lorsque la dite place sera rendue, le navire et sa cargaison ne pourront etre confisqués, mais seront remis aux propriétaires.

Art. 13. Pour régler ce qu'on entendra par contrebande de guerre, seront compris sous cette dénomination la poudre, le salpetre, les pétards, mèches, balles, boulets, bombes, grenades, carcasses, piques, hallebardes, épées, ceinturons, pistolets, fourreaux, selles de cavalerie, harnais, canons, mortiers avec leurs affuts, et généralement toutes armes et munitions de guerre et ustensiles, à l'usage des troupes. Tous les articles ci-dessus, toutes les fois qu'ils seront destinés pour le port d'un ennemi, sont déclarés de contrebande, et justement soumis à la confiscation. Mais le bâtiment sur lequel ils étaient chargés, ainsi que le reste de la cargaison, seront regardés comme libres, et ne pourront en aucune manière etre viciés par les marchandises de contrebande, soit qu'ils appartiennent à un meme ou à differens propriétaires.

Art. 14. Il est stipulé par le présent traité que les bâtimens libres assureront également la liberté des marchandises, et qu'on jugera libres toutes les choses qui se trouveront à bord des navires appartenans aux citoyens d'une des parties contractantes, quand meme le chargement ou partie d'icelui appartiendrait aux ennemis de l'une des deux: bien entendu, néanmoins, que la contrebande sera toujours excepté. Il est également convenu que cette meme liberté s'étendra aux personnes qui pourraient se trouver à bord du bâtiment libre, quand même elles seraient ennemis de l'une des deux parties contractantes, et elles ne pourront etre enlévées des dits navires libres, à moins qu'elles ne soient militaires, et actuellement au service de l'ennemi.

Art. 15. On est convenu, au contraire, que tout ce qui se trouvera chargé par les citoyens respectifs sur des navires appartenans aux ennemis de l'autre partie, ou à leurs sujets, sera confisqué, sans distinction des marchandises prohibées ou non prohibées, ainsi et de meme que si elles appartenaient à l'ennemi, à l'exception toutefois des effets et marchandises qui auront été mis à bord des dits navires avant la déclaration de guerre, ou même après la dite déclaration, si, au moment du chargement, on a pu l'ignorer; de maniere que les marchandises des citoyens des deux parties, soit qu'elles se trouvent du nombre de celles de contrebande ou autrement, lesquelles, comme il vient d'etre dit, auront été mises à bord d'un vaisseau appartenant à l'ennemi avant la guerre, ou meme après la dite déclaration, lorsqu'on l'ignorait, ne seront, en aucune manière, sujettes à confiscation, mais seront fidèlement et de bonne foi rendues, sans délai, à leurs propriétaires qui les reclameront; bien entendu néanmoins qu'il ne soit pas permis de porter dans les ports ennemis les marchandises qui seront de contrebande.

Les deux parties contractantes conviennent que le terme de deux mois passé depuis la déclaration de guerre, leurs citoyens respectifs de quelque partie du monde qu'ils viennent, ne pourront plus alléguer l'ignorance dont il est question dans le présent article.

Art. 16. Les navires marchands appartenans à des citoyens de l'une ou d'autre des deux parties contractantes, lorsqu'ils voudront passer dans le port de l'ennemi de l'une des deux parties, et que leur voyage, ainsi que les effets de leur cargaison, pourront donner de justes soupçons, les dits navires seront obligés d'exhiber, en pleine mer comme dans les ports ou rades, non seulement leurs passeports, mais encore leurs certificats, prouvant que ces effets ne sont point de la même espèce que ceux de contrebande specifiés dans l'article treize de la présente convention.

Art. 17. Et afin d'éviter des captures sur des soupçons frivoles, et de prévenir les dommages qui en résultent, il est convenu que, quand une des deux parties sera en guerre et l'autre neutre, les navires de la partie neutre seront pourvus de passeports semblables à ceux spécifiés dans l'article quatre, de manière qu'il puisse par là apparaitre que les navires appartiennent véritablement à la

And whereas, it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy, without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel, so circumstanced, may be turned away from such port or place, but she shall not be detained, nor any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless, after notice of such blockade or investment, she shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she shall think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either, that may have entered into such port or place before the same was actually besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo, nor, if found therein after the reduction and surrender of such place, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners thereof.

Art. 13. In order to regulate what shall be deemed contraband of war, there shall be comprised under that denomination gun-powder, saltpetre, petards, match, ball, bombs, grenades, carcasses, pikes, halberds, swords, belts, pistols, holsters, cavalry saddles and furniture, cannon, mortars, their carriages and beds, and generally all kinds of arms, ammunition of war, and instruments fit for the use of troops: all the above articles, whenever they are destined to the port of an enemy, are hereby declared to be contraband, and just objects of confiscation: but the vessel in which they are laden, and the residue of the cargo, shall be considered free, and not in any manner infected by the prohibited goods, whether belonging to the same, or a different owner.

Art. 14. It is hereby stipulated that free ships shall give a freedom to goods, and that every thing shall be deemed to be free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed, in like manner, that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect: that although they be enemies to either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship, unless they are soldiers and in actual service of the enemy.

Art. 15. On the contrary, it is agreed, that whatever shall be found to be laden by the citizens of either party on any ship belonging to the enemies of the other, or their citizens, shall be confiscated without distinction of goods, contraband or not contraband, in the same manner as if it belonged to the enemy, except such goods and merchandises as were put on board such ship before the declaration of war, or even after such declaration, if so be it were done without knowledge of such declaration; so that the goods of the citizens of either party, whether they be of the nature of such as are prohibited, or otherwise, which, as is aforesaid, were put on board any ship belonging to an enemy before the war, or after the declaration of the same, without the knowledge of it, shall no ways be liable to confiscation, but shall well and truly be restored without delay to the proprietors demanding the same; but so as that if the said merchandises be contraband, it shall not be in any way lawful to carry them afterwards to any ports belonging to the enemy.

The two contracting parties agree, that the term of two months being passed after the declaration of war, their respective citizens, from whatever part of the world they come, shall not plead the ignorance mentioned in this article.

Art. 16. The merchant ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, which shall be bound to a port of the enemy of one of the parties, and concerning whose voyage, and the articles of their cargo, there shall be just grounds of suspicion, shall be obliged to exhibit, as well upon the high seas as in the ports or roads, not only their passports, but likewise their certificates, showing that their goods are not of the quality of those which are specified to be contraband in the thirteenth article of the present convention.

Art. 17. And that captures on light suspicions may be avoided, and injuries thence arising prevented, it is agreed, that when one party shall be engaged in war, and the other party be neuter, the ships of the neutral party shall be furnished with passports similar to that described in the fourth article, that it may appear thereby that the ships really belong to the citizens of the neutral party:

partie neutre. Ces passeports seront valides pour un nombre quelconque de voyages; mais ils seront renouvellés chaque année, si le navire retourne chez lui dans l'espace d'une année. Si ces navires sont chargés, ils seront pourvus non seulement des passeports susmentionnés, mais aussi de certificats semblables à ceux mentionnés au même article, de manière que l'on puisse connaitre s'il y à bord des marchandises de contrebande. Il ne sera exigé aucune autre pièce, non obstant tous usages et réglemens contraires; et s'il n'apparait pas par ces certificats qu'il y ait des marchandises de contrebande à bord, les navires seront laissés à leur destination. Si, au contraire, il apparait, par ces certificats, que les dits navires ayent des marchandises de contrebande à bord, et que le commandant offre de les délivrer, l'offre sera acceptée, et le navire sera remis en liberté de poursuivre son voyage, à moins que la quantité de marchandises de contrebande ne soit trop grande pour pouvoir etre prise convenablement à bord du vaisseau de guerre ou corsaire; dans ce cas, le navire pourra être amené dans le port pour y délivrer la dite marchandise.

Si un navire est trouvé sans avoir le passeport ou les certificats ci-dessus exigés, l'affaire sera examinée par les juges ou tribunaux compétens; et s'il conste, par d'autres documens ou preuves admissibles par l'usage des nations, que le navire appartient à des citoyens de la partie neutre, il ne sera pas condamné, et il sera remis en liberté avec son chargement, la contrebande exceptée, et aura la liberté de poursuivre sa route.

Si le capitaine nommé dans le passeport du navire venait à mourir, ou à être ôté par toute autre cause, et qu'un autre fut nommé à sa place, le navire et sa cargaison n'en seront pas moins en sûreté, et le passeport demeurera dans toute sa force.

Art. 18. Si les bâtimens des citoyens de l'une ou l'autre nation sont rencontrés de long des côtes, ou en pleine mer, par quelques vaisseaux de guerre ou corsaires de l'autre, pour prévenir tout désordre, les dits vaisseaux ou corsaires se tiendront hors de la portée du canon, et enverront leurs canots à bord du navire marchand qu'ils auront rencontré: ils n'y pourront entrer qu'au nombre de deux ou trois hommes, et demander au patron ou capitaine du dit navire exhibition du passeport concernant la propriété du dit navire, fait d'après la formule prescrite dans l'article quatre, ainsi que les certificats susmentionnés relatifs à la cargaison. Il est expressément convenu que le neutre ne pourra etre contraint d'aller à bord du vaisseau visitant pour y faire l'exhibition demandée des papiers, ou pour toute autre information quelconque.

Art. 19. Il est expressément convenu par les parties contractantes, que les stipulations ci-dessus, relatives à la conduite qui sera tenue à la mer par les croiseurs de la partie belligérante, envers les bâtiments de la partie neutre, ne s'appliqueront qu'aux bâtiments navigant sans convoi: et dans le cas où les dits bâtiments seraient convoyés, l'intention des parties étant d'observer tous les égards dus à la protection du pavillon arboré sur les vaisseaux publics, on ne pourra point en faire la visite. Mais la déclaration verbale du commandant de l'escorte, que les navires de son convoi appartiennent à la nation dont ils portent le pavillon, et qu'ils n'ont aucune contrebande à bord, sera regardée par les croiseurs respectifs comme pleinement suffisante; les deux parties s'engageant réciproquement à ne point admettre, sous la protection de leur convoi, des bâtiments qui porteraient des marchandises prohibées à une destination ennemie.

Art. 20. Dans le cas où les bâtiments seront pris ou arrêtés, sous prétexte de porter à l'ennemi quelqu'article de contrebande, le capteur donnera un reçu des papiers du bâtiment qu'il retiendra, lequel reçu sera joint à une liste énonciative des dits papiers: il ne sera point permis de forcer ni d'ouvrir les écoutilles, coffres, caisses, caissons, bales, ou vases, trouvés à bord du dit navire, ni d'enlever la moindre chose des effets, avant que la cargaison ait été débarquée en présence des officiers compétens, qui feront un inventaire des dits effets; ils ne pourront, en aucune manière, être vendus, échangés, ou aliénés, à moins qu'après une procédure légale, le juge ou les juges compétens n'ayent porté contre les dits effets sentence de confiscation, (en exceptant toujours le navire et les autres objets qu'il contient.)

Art. 21. Pour que le bâtiment et la cargaison soient surveillés avec soin, et pour empêcher les dégâts, il est arrêté que le patron, capitaine, ou subrécargue du navire capturé, ne pourront être éloignés du bord, soit pendant que le navire sera en mer après avoir été pris, soit pendant les procédures qui pourront avoir lieu contre lui, sa cargaison, ou quelque chose y relative.

Dans le cas où le navire appartenant à des citoyens de l'une ou de l'autre partie serait pris, saisi, et retenu, pour être jugé, ses officiers, passagers, et équipage seront traités they shall be valid for any number of voyages, but shall be renewed every year, that is, if the ship happens to return home in the space of a year. If the ships are laden, they shall be provided not only with the passports above mentioned, but also with certificates similar to those described in the same article; so that it may be known whether they carry any contraband goods. No other paper shall be required, any usage or ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding. And if it shall not appear from the said certificates that there are contraband goods on board, the ships shall be permitted to proceed on their voyage. If it shall appear from the certificates that there are contraband goods on board any such ship, and the commander of the same shall offer to deliver them up, the offer shall be accepted, and the ship shall be at liberty to pursue its voyage, unless the quantity of the contraband goods be greater than can conveniently be received on board the ship of war or privateer; in which case, the ship may be carried into port for the delivery of the same.

If any ship shall not be furnished with such passport or certificates as are above required for the same, such case may be examined by a proper judge or tribunal; and if it shall appear, from other documents or proofs admissible by the usage of nations, that the ship belongs to the citizens of the neutral party, it shall not be confiscated, but shall be released with her cargo, (contraband goods excepted,) and be permitted to proceed on her voyage.

If the master of a ship named in the passport should happen to die, or be removed by any other cause, and another put in his place, the ship and cargo shall nevertheless be equally secure, and the passport remain in full force.

Art. 18. If the ships of the citizens of either of the parties shall be met with, either sailing along the coasts or on the high seas, by any ship of war or privateer of the other; for the avoiding of any disorder, the said ships of war or privateers shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send their boats on board the merchant ship which they shall so meet with, and may enter her to the number of two or three men only, to whom the master or commander of such ship shall exhibit his passport concerning the property of the ship, made out according to the form prescribed in the fourth article. And it is expressly agreed that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting his papers, or for any other examination whatever.

Art. 19. It is expressly agreed by the contracting parties, that the stipulations above mentioned, relative to the conduct to be observed on the sea by the cruisers of the belligerent party towards the ships of the neutral party, shall be applied only to ships sailing without convoy; and when the said ships shall be convoyed, it being the intention of the parties to observe all the regard due to the protection of the flag displayed by public ships, it shall not be lawful to visit them: but the verbal declaration of the commander of the convoy, that the ships he convoys belong to the nation whose flag he carries, and that they have no contraband goods on board, shall be considered by the respective cruisers as fully sufficient; the two parties reciprocally engaging not to admit, under the protection of their convoys, ships which shall carry contraband goods destined to an enemy.

Art. 20. In all cases where vessels shall be captured or detained under pretence of carrying to the enemy contraband goods, the captor shall give a receipt for such of the papers of the vessel as he shall retain, which receipt shall be annexed to a descriptive list of the said papers: and it shall be unlawful to break up or open the hatches, chests, trunks, casks, bales, or vessels found on board, or remove the smallest part of the goods, unless the lading be brought on shore in presence of the competent officers, and an inventory be made by them of the said goods. Nor shall it be lawful to sell, exchange, or alienate the same in any manner, unless there shall have been lawful process, and the competent judge or judges shall have pronounced against such goods sentence of confiscation, saving always the ship and the other goods which it contains.

Art. 21. And that proper care may be taken of the vessel and cargo, and embezzlement prevented, it is agreed, that it shall not be lawful to remove the master, commander, or supercargo of any captured ship, from on board thereof, either during the time the ship may be at sea after her capture, or pending the proceedings against her, or her cargo, or any thing relative thereto. And in all cases where a vessel of the citizens of either party shall be captured or seized, and held for adjudication, her officers, passengers, and crew, shall be hospitably treated.

avec humanité; ils ne pourront être imprisonnés, ni dépouillés de leurs vetemens, ni de l'argent à leur usage, qui ne pourra excéder, pour le capitaine, le subrécargue, et le second, cinq cents dollars chacun; et pour les matelots et passagers, cent dollars chacun.

ART. 22. Il est de plus convenu, que dans tous les cas, les tribunaux établis pour les causes de prises dans les pays où les prises seront conduites, pourront seuls en prendre connaissance; et quelque jugement que le tribunal de l'une ou de l'autre partie prononce contre quelques navires, ou marchandises, ou propriétés réclamées par des citoyens de l'autre partie, le sentence ou décret fera mention des raisons ou motifs qui ont déterminé ce jugement, dont copie authentique, ainsi que de toute la procédure y relative, sera, à leur réquisition, delivrée, sans délai, au capitaine ou agent du dit navire, moyennant le payement des frais.

ART. 23. Et afin de pourvoir plus efficacement à la sureté respective des citoyens des deux parties contractantes, et prévenir les torts qu'ils auraient à craindre des vaisseaux de guerre ou corsaires de l'une ou l'autre partie, tous commandans des vaisseaux de guerre et de corsaires, et tous autres citoyens de l'une des deux parties, s'abstiendront de tout dommage envers les citoyens de l'autre, et de toute insulte envers leurs personnes. S'ils faisaient le contraire, ils seront punis, et tenus à donner, dans leurs personnes et propriétés, satisfaction et réparation pour les dommages, avec intérêt, de quelque espèce que soient les dits dommages.

A cet effet, tous capitaines de corsaires, avant de recevoir leurs commissions, s'obligeront, devant un juge compétent, à donner une garantie au moins par deux cautions responsables, lesquelles n'auront aucun intéret sur le dit corsaire, et dont chacune, ainsi que le capitaine, s'engagera particulièrement et solidairement pour la somme de sept mille dollars, ou trente-six mille huit cent vingt francs; et si les dits vaisseaux portent plus de cent cinquante matelots ou soldats, pour la somme de quatorze mille dollars, ou soixante-treize mille six cent quarante francs, qui serviront à reparer les torts ou dommages que les dits corsaires, leurs officiers, équipages, ou quelqu'un d'eux, auraient fait ou commis pendant leur croisière, de contraire aux dispositions de la présente convention, ou aux lois et instructions qui devront être la règle de leur conduite: en outre, les dites commissions seront révoquées et annullées dans tous les cas où il y aura en aggression.

ART. 24. Lorsque les vaisseaux de guerre des deux parties contractantes, ou ceux que leur citoyens auraient armés en guerre, seront admis à relâcher, avec leurs prises, dans les ports de l'une des deux parties, les dits vaisseaux publics ou particuliers, de même que leurs prises, ne seront obligés à payer aucun droit, soit aux officiers du lieu, soit aux juges, ou à tous autres; les dites prises entrant dans les hâvres ou ports de l'une des deux parties ne pourront être arretées ou saisies, et les officiers des lieux ne pourront prendre connaissance de la validité des dites prises, lesquelles pourront sortir et être conduites en toute franchise et liberté aux lieux portés par les commissions dont les capitaines des dits vaisseaux seront obligées de faire apparoir. Il est toujours entendu que les stipulations de cet article ne s'étendront pas au delà des priviléges des nations les plus favorisées.

ART. 25. Tous corsaires étrangers ayant des commissions d'un état ou prince en guerre avec l'une ou l'autre nation, ne pourront armer leurs vaisseaux dans les ports de l'une ou l'autre nation, non plus qu'y vendre leurs prises, ni les échanger en aucune manière: il ne leur sera permis d'acheter des provisions que la quantité nécessaire pour gagner le port le plus voisin de l'etat ou prince duquel ils ont reçu leurs commission.

ART. 26. Il est de plus convenu qu'aucune des deux parties contractantes non seulement ne recevra point de pirates dans ses ports, rades, ou villes, et ne permettra pas qu'aucun de ses habitans les reçoive, protège, accueille ou recèle en aucune manière, mais encore livrera à un juste châtiment ceux de ces habitans qui seraient coupables de pareils faits ou délits. Les vaisseaux de ces pirates, ainsi que les effets et marchandises par eux pris et amenés dans les ports de l'une ou l'autre nation, seront saisis partout où ils seront découverts, et restitués à leurs propriétaires, agens, ou facteurs duement autorisés par eux, après toutefois qu'ils auront prouvé devant les juges competens le droit de propriété.

Que si les dits effets avaient passé, par vente, en d'autres mains, et que les acquéreurs fussent ou pussent être instruits ou soupçonnaient que les dits effets avaient été enlevés par des pirates, ils seront également restitués.

ART. 27. Aucune des deux nations ne viendra participer aux pêcheries de l'autre sur ses côtes, ni la troubler dans l'exercise des droits qu'elle a maintenant ou pour-

They shall not be imprisoned or deprived of any part of their wearing apparel, nor of the possession and use of their money, not exceeding for the captain, supercargo, and mate, five hundred dollars each, and for the sailors and passengers, one hundred dollars each.

ART. 22. It is further agreed, that in all cases the established courts for prize causes, in the country to which the prizes may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance of them. And whenever such tribunal of either of the parties shall pronounce judgment against any vessel or goods or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded, and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of the said vessel, without any delay, he paying the legal fees for the same.

ART. 23. And that more abundant care may be taken for the security of the respective citizens of the contracting parties, and to prevent their suffering injuries by the men of war, or privateers of either party, all commanders of ships of war and privateers, and all others the said citizens, shall forbear doing any damage to those of the other party, or committing any outrage against them; and if they act to the contrary, they shall be punished, and shall also be bound in their persons and estates to make satisfaction and reparation for all damages, and the interest thereof, of whatever nature the said damages may be.

For this cause, all commanders of privateers, before they receive their commissions, shall hereafter be obliged to give, before a competent judge, sufficient security by at least two responsible sureties, who have no interest in the said privateer, each of whom, together with the said commander, shall be jointly and severally bound in the sum of seven thousand dollars, or thirty-six thousand eight hundred and twenty francs; or if such ships be provided with above one hundred and fifty seamen or soldiers, in the sum of fourteen thousand dollars, or seventy-three thousand six hundred and forty francs; to satisfy all damages and injuries which the said privateer, or her officers or men, or any of them, may do or commit during their cruise, contrary to the tenor of this convention, or to the laws and instructions for regulating their conduct: and further, that in all cases of aggressions, the said commissions shall be revoked and annulled.

ART. 24. When the ships of war of the two contracting parties, or those belonging to their citizens which are armed in war, shall be admitted to enter with their prizes the ports of either of the two parties, the said public or private ships, as well as their prizes, shall not be obliged to pay any duty either to the officers of the place, the judges, or any others; nor shall such prizes, when they come to and enter the ports of either party, be arrested or seized; nor shall the officers of the place make examination concerning the lawfulness of such prizes; but they may hoist sail at any time, and depart, and carry their prizes to the places expressed in their commissions, which the commanders of such ships of war shall be obliged to show. It is always understood that the stipulations of this article shall not extend beyond the privileges of the most favored nation.

ART. 25. It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers who have commissions from any Prince or state in enmity with either nation, to fit their ships in the ports of either nation, to sell their prizes, or in any manner to exchange them; neither shall they be allowed to purchase provisions, except such as shall be necessary for their going to the next port of that Prince or state, from which they have received their commissions.

ART. 26. It is further agreed, that both the said contracting parties shall not only refuse to receive any pirates into any of their ports, havens, or towns, or permit any of their inhabitants to receive, protect, harbor, conceal, or assist them in any manner, but will bring to condign punishment all such inhabitants as shall be guilty of such acts or offences. And all their ships, with the goods or merchandises taken by them and brought into the port of either of the said parties, shall be seized, as far as they can be discovered, and shall be restored to the owners, or their factors, or agents, duly authorized by them, (proper evidence being first given before competent judges for proving the property;) even in case such effects should have passed into other hands by sale, if it be proved that the buyers knew, or had good reason to believe or suspect that they had been piratically taken.

ART. 27. Neither party will intermeddle in the fisheries of the other on its coasts, nor disturb the other in the exercise of the rights which it now holds, or may ac-rait acquérir sus les côtes de Terreneuve, dans le golfe de St. Laurent, ou partout ailleurs, sur les côtes d'Amérique au nord des Etats Unis; mais la pêche de la baleine et du veau marin sera libre pour les deux nations dans toutes les parties du monde.

Cette convention sera ratifiée de part et d'autre en bonne et due forme, et les ratifications seront échangées dans l'espace de six mois, ou plutôt s'il est possible.

En foi de quoi les plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signé les articles ci-dessus, tant en langue Française qu'en langue Anglaise, et ils y ont apposé leurs sceaux, déclarant, néanmoins, que la signature en deux langues ne sera point citée comme exemple, et ne préjudicera à aucune des deux parties.

quire on the coast of Newfoundland in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or elsewhere on the American coast, northward of the United States. But the whale and seal fisheries shall be free to both in every quarter of the world.

This convention shall be ratified on both sides in due form, and the ratifications exchanged in the space of six months, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the above articles both in the French and English languages, and they have thereto affixed their seals; declaring, nevertheless, that the signing in the two languages shall not be brought into precedent nor in any way operate to the prejudice of either party.

Journal of Oliver Ellsworth, William R. Davie, and William Vans Murray, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the court of France, containing their correspondence and negotiations from the 17th of January, 1800, to the 3d of October in the same year; and terminating in the convention with France, of the 30th September, 1800.

OCTOBER 16, 1799.

The following letter from the Secretary of State, with its enclosure, was delivered to Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie, at Trenton.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Trenton, October 16, 1799.

SIR:

To fulfil the President's orders, and to convey correctly to you and ——— his sentiments towards you, and his determination respecting your mission as envoys extraordinary to the French republic, I enclose a copy of his letter to me of this date; and have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

TRENTON, October 16, 1799.

SIR:

I request you to order fair copies of the instructions, as corrected last evening, to be prepared and delivered to Judge Ellsworth and Governor Davie, with another for Mr. Murray, without loss of time; and to write a letter to those gentlemen as envoys extraordinary to the French republic, expressing, with the affectionate respects of the President, his desire that they would take their passage for France, on board the frigate the United States, Captain Barry, now lying at Rhode Island, by the 1st of November, or sooner, if consistent with their conveniencies. Captain Barry will have orders to land them in any port of France which they may prefer, and to touch at any other ports which they may desire. The President's best wishes for their health and happiness, as well as for an honorable termination of their mission, will attend them. As their visit to France is at one of the most critical, important, and interesting moments that ever has occurred, it cannot fail to be highly entertaining and instructive to them, and useful to their country, whether it terminate in peace and reconciliation or not. The President sincerely prays God to have them in his holy keeping.

I am, sir, with great respect and esteem, your faithful humble servant,

JOHN ADAMS.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

Instructions to Oliver Ellsworth, William Richardson Davie, and William Vans Murray, Esquires, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the French republic.

GENTLEMEN:

You have been witnesses of the enduring patience of the United States, under the unexampled aggressions, depredations, and hostilities, authorized and sanctioned by the French republic against the commerce and citizens of the United States: and you are well informed of the measures adopted by our Government to put a stop to these evils, to obtain redress for the injured, and real peace and security to our country. And you know that, instead of relief, instead of justice, instead of indemnity for past wrongs, our very moderate demands have been immediately followed by new aggressions and more extended depredations; while our ministers, seeking redress and reconciliation, have been refused a reception, treated with indignities, and finally driven from its territories.

This conduct of the French republic would well have justified an immediate declaration of war on the part of the United States; but desirous of maintaining peace, and still willing to leave open the door of reconciliation with France, the United States contented themselves with preparations for defence, and measures calculated to protect their commerce.

The treatment experienced by the former envoys of the United States to the French republic, having determined the President not to send thither other ministers, without direct and unequivocal assurances previously signified by its Minister of Foreign Relations, that they would be received in character to an audience of the Directory, and that they should enjoy all the prerogatives attached to that character by the law of nations, and that a minister or ministers of equal powers should be appointed and commissioned to treat with them: the French Government, by Mr. Talleyrand, its Minister of Foreign Relations, has declared, that it will receive the envoys of the United States in the official character with which they are invested; that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives attached to it by the law of nations; and that one or more ministers shall be duly authorized to treat with them. This the President deems to be substantially the assurance which he required as the previous condition of the envoys entering on their mission. It now belongs to you, gentlemen, to see that this assurance be verified. Your country will not submit to any new indignity or neglect. It is expected, when you shall have assembled at Paris, and have given official notice of it to the Minister of Foreign Relations, that you will be received to an audience of the Executive Directory; that a minister or ministers, with powers equal to your own, will be appointed to treat with you; and that within twenty days at farthest, after your arrival at Paris, your negotiation will be commenced. If, however, your passports to Paris should be unreasonably withheld; if an audience of the Directory should be denied or procrastinated; if the appointment of a minister or ministers, with equal powers, to treat with you, should be delayed; or, if when appointed, they postpone the intended negotiation; you are to relinquish your mission, demand your passports, and leave France; and, having once resolved to terminate the mission, you are not to resume it, whatever fresh overtures or assurances may be tendered to you by the French Government.

One more limitation: The subjects of difference between the United States and France have often been discussed, and are well understood; and, therefore, admit of a speedy decision. The negotiation is expected to be concluded in such time that you may certainly embark for the United States by the 1st of next April. This is highly important, in order that on your return Congress may be found in session, to take those measures which the result of your mission shall require. If it can be earlier concluded it will be still better.

If any of the periods above mentioned should be prolonged with your assent, it is expected that the circumstances will be stated for your justification.

I. At the opening of the negotiation you will inform the French ministers, that the United States expect from France, as an indispensable condition of the treaty, a stipulation to make to the citizens of the United States full compensation for all losses and damages which they shall have sustained, by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from the French republic or its agents. And all captures and condemnations are deemed irregular or illegal, when contrary to the law of nations generally received and acknowledged in Europe, and to the stipulations in the treaty of amity and commerce, of the 6th of February, 1778, fairly and ingeneously interpreted, while that treaty remained in force; especially when made and pronounced.

1. Because the vessels lading, or any part thereof, consisted of provisions or merchandise coming from England or her possessions.

2. Because the vessels were not provided with the róles d'équipage prescribed by the laws of France; and which, it has been pretended, were also required by treaty.

3. Because sea letters or other papers were wanting, or said to be wanting when the property shall have been, or shall be, admitted or proved to be American. Such defect of papers, though it might justify the captors and exempt them from damages, for bringing in such vessels for examination, could not, with reason, be a ground of condemnation.

4. When the owners, masters, or supercargoes shall have been refused a hearing, or placed in situations rendering their presence at the trial impracticable.

5. When the vessels or other property captured shall have been sold, or otherwise disposed of, without a regular trial and condemnation.

Captures and condemnations for such causes, and under such circumstances, are manifestly irregular or illegal.

The French Government, if it has any serious wish to accommodate existing differences, can make no difficulty in admitting the general proposition, that, for injuries arising from violated laws and engagements, reparation shall be made. In every claim under this general stipulation, the question will occur, Has the treaty, or the law of nations, been violated?

But such a general stipulation will not be sufficient. The five specific propositions just stated are obviously proper rules of adjudication; but the previous admission of the first and second is vastly important, to remove from hazard the most interesting claims of our citizens.

To capture neutral property, because it was produced or manufactured in the country of an enemy to France, is so palpably unjust, that it seems improbable that even the men who orginated the law, were they still in power, would persist in it as of right; and it is scarcely possible for their successors to hesitate on this point. To hesitate would be to doubt whether a man has a right to occupy his own house, or to wear his own clothes, unless he had built the first, or manufactured the last, with his own hands.

The second proposition respecting the róle d'équipage, as well as the first, should be insisted on. Until the decree of the Directory of March 2, 1797, was passed, and we had felt its fatal effects, we had no idea of the meaning which the French applied to the phrase róle d'equipage. In the consular convention between the United States and France, article ninth, which relates to deserters from vessels, the document is described in the French by the words "des registres du bâtiment ou róle d'équipage," and in the English part of the convention by the words "the registers of the vessel or ship's rolls." And this paper was to be produced to the proper judge, to prove a deserter to belong to the vessel in question. The law or usage of each nation was incontestably to direct what was proper for its own vessels in this respect. If an American master claimed from a judge in France his warrant to arrest a deserter, he must have produced his "ship's roll," or what in the United States is called his shipping paper, which is a contract signed by all the persons composing a vessel's crew. The propriety and necessity of a ship's roll was, in the year 1790, sanctioned and enforced by an act of Congress; and, without such a written contract, the master, besides being subjected to other disadvantages, could not claim his men when they deserted. This ship's roll every American master, bound on a foreign voyage, takes on board his vessel; and, unquestionably, every American vessel, captured and condemned by the French for the want of a róle d'équipage, has nevertheless been possessed of the ship's roll, just described; and it is the only list of the ship's crew, which could ever have been contemplated by the United States, as necessary for American vessels. There never was, indeed, any intimation on the part of France, from 1778, when the treaty of amity and commerce was made, until the passing of the decree of the Directory, in March, 1797, that a róle d'equipage, other than the ship's roll, or shipping paper, would be required. It was then suddenly demanded; and the decree (like the law of January, 1798, respecting articles of the produce or manufacture of Great Britain,) was instantly enforced, and became a snare to the multitudes of American vessels, which, for want of previous notice, would not have on board the document in question, if their Government should permit them to receive a document which they were under no obligation to produce. For it cannot, with any semblance of justice, be pretended that the vessels of one nation are bound to furnish themselves with papers in forms prescribed by the laws of another. And if we resort to the treaty of 1778, or to the sea-letter or passport annexed to it, on which letter the Directory pretended to found their decree concerning the "róle d'équipage," we shall see that these words are not to be found in either; and, although the passport mentions "a list signed and witnessed, containing the names, surnames, the places of birth, and abode of the crew of his [the neutral master's] ship, and of all who shall embark on board her, whom he shall not take on board without the knowledge and permission of the officers of the marine;" yet, instead of being obliged "to have the list on board," the passport declares, that "he shall enter it in the proper office;" and all that the treaty requires him to exhibit at sea is the sea-letter, or passport. In a word, whatever is said about the róle d'équipage, in the French application of the phrase, has relation to the laws and usages of France. It was to be exhibited to the officers of the marine; but the United States have not, nor ever had, like France, any such description of officers, employed in the examination and clearing of vessels and their crews, prior to their going to sea; and the Directory, if they had wanted pretences for despoiling our commerce, might as well have made the omission of appointing marine officers in our ports, to whom, according to the letter of the passport, the róle d' équipage was to be exhibited, a cause of capture and condemnation, as the omitting to furnish them with róles d'équipage in the French form. In preparing, in 1793, the sea-letter for American vessels, the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, changed, in divers places, the letter of the passport, substituting other words applicable to us; and for "officers of the marine," "officers and judges of the marine," which words were descriptive of French institutions, using only the phrase, "proper officers," in conformity with our own. In the same manner, the "ship's roll," or shipping paper of the United States, if at all required, should have been respected by France, as her "róle d'équipage" would have been respected by the United States. And, after all, what was the real object of the sea-letter, (in which alone there is any reference to a list of the crew,) and what was it substantially to express? The twenty-fifth article of the treaty of 1778 informs us, "in case either of the parties should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the subjects or people of the other ally, must be furnished with sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and habitation of the master or commander of the said ship, "that it may appear thereby, that the ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties;" and with this further view, "that all manner of dissensions and quarrels might be avoided and prevented:" for, as was declared in the twenty-seventh article, when a ship of the party remaining neutral, met with by a ship of the other party, had shown her sea-letter or passport, she was to "be free and at liberty to pursue her voyage, so as it should not be lawful to molest or search her in any manner, or to give her chase, or force her to quit her intended course."

It also merits observation, that, according to the tenor of the sea-letter or passport, in every port or haven where he [the neutral master] should enter with his ship, he is required to show, not a rôle d'équipage, but his passport. Yet this passport, made and intended by the Governments of France and the United States, in 1778, to facilitate and protect their commerce, to exempt it from vexations, and to prevent dissensions and quarrels, has, by the Government of France, been converted into a fatal snare, an engine of mischief, producing quarrels, dissensions, vexations, and, to the commerce of many American citizens, absolute destruction.

II. If these preliminaries should be satisfactorily arranged, then, for the purpose of examining and adjusting all the claims of our citizens, it will be necessary to provide for the appointment of a Board of Commissioners similar to that described in the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain.

The commissioners of the two nations may first meet at Paris. In choosing the fifth commissioner, they will have a right to propose a Frenchman or an American. But it might conduce to more satisfactory results if the fifth commissioner were a foreign civilian, eminent for his learning, talents, and integrity.

Three of the commissioners may constitute a board, provided one named on each side and the fifth commissioner be present. The four commissioners, in the absence of the fifth, may also constitute a board; and, in each case, the decisions of a majority are to be valid. But, when on any questions, the four commissioners, in the absence of the fifth, shall be equally divided, such questions are to be re-examined and decided in the presence of the fifth commissioner. Further, in absence of the fifth commissioner, any three of the other commissioners may constitute a board, and their decisions valid in cases where they are unanimous.

The salaries of the commissioners, the expense attending the commission, and the supplying of vacancies in it, may be regulated in the manner proposed in the eighth article of our treaty of amity and commerce with Great Britain.

The commissioners should be appointed and meet at Paris, within six months after the ratifications of the treaty by the respective Governments, and as much sooner as may be.

Claims may be presented to the board during two years, commencing with the day on which the commissioners shall first assemble to proceed to business; and, in particular cases, in which it shall appear to them reasonable and just, they may extend the time of receiving claims to any reasonable term after the expiration of the two years.

All sums which the board may award to American claimants France should stipulate to pay in gold and silver, without any deduction, at such place or places, and at such time or times, as the commissioners shall appoint. The awards should comprehend a reasonable allowance of interest on the amount of the original losses and damages, or, instead of prompt payment, the whole may constitute a transferable capital, bearing interest until the debt be discharged.

The board should also take cognizance of the claims, which may be presented to them by American citizens, for merchandise, or other property, seized by the French in their own ports or elsewhere, and not comprehended under the head of captures; and for their vessels arbitrarily and unreasonably detained in French ports, and for the losses and damages thereby sustained, the board should award equitable compensations to be paid in the manner prescribed in the case of captures.

The claims of the United States, as distinguished from those of their citizens, for injuries received from the French republic, or its citizens, should be submitted to the same board; and whatever sums they award, France should stipulate to pay, in the manner before mentioned, in the case of captures.

As the French Government have heretofore complained of infringements of the treaty of amity and commerce by the United States, or their citizens, all claims for injuries thereby occasioned to France, or its citizens, are to be submitted to the same board; and whatever damages they award, will be allowed by the United States, and deducted from the sums awarded to be paid by France.

If, however, the French Government should desire to waive its national claims, you may do the like on the part of the United States. Doubtless the claims of the latter would exceed those of the former; but, to avoid multiplying subjects of dispute, and because national claims may probably be less definite than those of individuals, and consequently more difficult to adjust, national claims may, on both sides, be relinquished.

All claims for sums due to American citizens, by contracts with the French Government or its agents, which may be presented to the board, France should stipulate to pay within the shortest periods possible to obtain, with interest, at the rate or rates agreed on; or, if no agreement about interest appears, then at the rate to be fixed by the board, and from the times when the sums were respectively payable by contract. This also may be transferable stock.

The questions about interest, and any other questions which may arise out of the claims founded on contracts, not explicitly determined by the treaty, may be left to the decision of the Board of Commissioners.

III. If the preceding claims shall be duly attended to, and adequate arrangements made for adjusting and satisfying them, you will then turn your thoughts to the regulation of navigation and commerce, and to some other points interesting to the two nations.

IV. It may be stipulated that there shall be a reciprocal and entirely perfect liberty of commerce and navigation between France and the United States, and their territories and dominions, in every part of the world: but without admitting the vessels of either country into the rivers of the other beyond the highest ports of entry from the sea.

With the usual policy of European nations, France may object to the free admission of American vessels into the ports of her colonies. But the singular injuries our commerce has sustained from France, during the present war, which no payments to be made by her, under the preceding stipulations, can ever fully compensate, plead for an entire liberty of trade with her colonies, at least during the term of the proposed treaty, and until the stipulated compensations shall actually have been made. Another reason will naturally operate in favor of this claim; the inability of France immediately to furnish the requisite navigation and supplies for the commerce of her distant possessions.

But if France will not allow us a trade with her colonies, on the terms which may be agreed in respect to the parent state, we should be silent on the subject. The commerce of all our territories will be open to France; that of all her dominions should be alike open to us. At any rate, it appears inexpedient for the United States to countenance injurious distinctions respecting colonial commerce, to obtain a share in it by agreeing to allow a price for it, in the payment of extra duties. Neither ought we to stipulate any thing like what is contained in the last clause of the third article of our treaty with the United Netherlands. Such an engagement would be a species of guaranty of the colony system. It is sufficient for the United States to treat foreign nations with justice and friendship.

V. It may be stipulated that no other or higher duties shall be paid by the ships or merchandise of one party in the ports of the other than such as are or shall be payable by the like vessels or merchandise of all other nations: that no other or higher duties shall be imposed in one country on the importation of any articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other, than are or shall be payable on the importation of the like articles being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; and that no prohibition shall be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles from or to the territories of the two parties, respectively, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

And for the information of their respective fellow-citizens, and to prevent abuses, it may be stipulated that the consuls of each nation shall be officially furnished in the other with tariffs of all imposts, customs, duties, and charges; by which tariffs the demands of the officers of each nation may be respectively limited.

VI. The freedom of navigation and commerce here proposed, will require the admission of the citizens of the two countries respectively into the dominions of the other, with liberty to reside there, to hire and possess houses and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce, and complete protection and security for the merchants and traders on each side, with their property, whether in going to, residing in, or returning from, the country of the other. Nor should they be liable to any tax on their persons or property, to which the natives are not equally subject. They should be at liberty to manage their own affairs, without being obliged to employ any factor, broker, or interpreter, or any persons to load or unload their vessels; with a right, however, to employ any or all of them, as well as advocates and attorneys, at their pleasure.

VII. The merchants and others of one nation, residing in the other, should have liberty to dispose of their property by testament, or otherwise, including real estates already acquired; and, if dying intestate, their heirs should enjoy the right of succession. Provided, that, if the laws of either country should at the time be incompatible with such transfer or inheritance of real estates by aliens, they may be sold or otherwise disposed of to citizens of the two countries respectively. The citizens of the United States should not, in respect to their property, be considered as aubains in France; and, consequently, should be exempted from the droit d'aubain, or other similar duty.

VIII. The mutual residence of citizens of the two nations in the countries of each other necessarily requires the free exercise of religion, at least in their own houses, and in their own way; and permission to bury the dead in convenient places.

IX. If debtors flee from one country to the other, the creditors should be allowed to pursue them, and have the benefit of the laws of the country to which they flee, in the same manner as if the debts had been there contracted.

X. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares nor moneys which they may have in the public funds, or in the public or private banks, should ever, in any event of war or national differences, be sequestered or confiscated.

XI. The ships of the citizens of the respective countries coming upon any coasts belonging to either, but not willing to enter into port; or, being entered into port, and not willing to unload their cargoes or break bulk; they should be treated according to the general rules prescribed, or to be prescribed, relative to the object in question.*

XII. Neither party should permit the ships or goods belonging to the citizens of the other to be taken within cannon shot of the coast, nor elsewhere within their jurisdiction, by ships of war or others having commission from any Prince, republic, or state whatever. But if such capture or other injury should happen, the party whose territorial rights are thus violated should use his utmost endeavors to obtain from the offending party full and ample satisfaction for the capture or other injury so committed. The just freedom of commerce, and the interest and dignity of the neutral nation, demand the protection of all vessels entering its ports, not only from being taken, but from being pursued within its jurisdiction, or immediately after their departure from its ports: therefore, their enemy, finding an asylum in those ports, should not be permitted to leave the same until the lapse of twenty-four hours after such departure.

XIII. No asylum should be given to pirates; vessels and property rescued from their hands should be restored to the proper owners; the pirates, and any who conceal or assist them, should be brought to condign punishment; all with the precautions customary in such cases.

XIV. The ships of war and other public vessels of each party should at all times be hospitably received in the ports of the other; their officers and crews paying due respect to the laws and government of the country.

XV. In case the citizens of either party with their private shipping, armed or unarmed, be forced, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, or any other urgent necessity, to seek for shelter in the ports of the other, they should be received and treated with humanity, and enjoy all friendly protection and assistance.

XVI. In the case of vessels wrecked, foundered, or otherwise damaged, they should receive in each country the same protection and assistance as if they belonged to the inhabitants of the country on whose coasts the misfortune should happen.

XVII. Each party may appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in the dominions and territories of the other, including colonies as well as the mother country: for wherever trade is permitted, there the assistance and protection of consuls is necessary. If a consul be sent to a colony, his provisional admission by the Colonial Government might suffice, until the pleasure of the National Government should be known. The consuls may enjoy the rights and liberties which belong to them by the law of nations.

XVIII. Deserters from public and private vessels should be delivered up, and the laws of each country make suitable provision for that purpose. The merchants and commanders of vessels, public and private, of one nation, in the country of the other, may engage and receive on board seamen or others, natives or inhabitants of the country to which the vessels belong: provided that, either on one side or the other, they may not take into their service such of their countrymen (not deserters) who have already engaged in the service of the other party, whether in war or trade, and whether they meet them by land or sea; at least if the captains or masters under whose command such persons may be found, will not voluntarily discharge them from their service. Not only the original enlistment, shipping paper, or rôle d'equipage, but a copy duly certified by a judge of the country, may be admitted in proof of desertion.

XIX. It may be agreed, that on mutual requisitions by the respective ministers or consuls of the two nations, persons charged with murder or forgery committed within the territorial jurisdiction of one, and fleeing to the other, shall be delivered up.

XX. It may be agreed that neither party shall intermeddle in the common fisheries on the coasts of the other party, nor disturb the other party in the exercise of the rights which either now holds, or may acquire, of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, or elsewhere on the American coast northward of the United States of America: but that the whale and seal fisheries may be freely exercised in every quarter of the world.

XXI. The seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the commercial treaty between the United States and France, of February 6th, 1778, have been the source of much altercation between the two nations during the present war. The dissolution of that and our other treaties with France leaves us at liberty with respect to future arrangements; with the exception of the now preferable right secured to Great Britain, by the twenty-fifth article of the treaty of amity and commerce. In that article we promise mutually that, while we continue in amity, neither party will in future make any treaty that shall be inconsistent with that article or the one preceding it. We cannot, therefore, renew with France the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of 1778. Her aggressions, which occasioned the dissolution of that treaty, have deprived her of the priority of rights and advantages therein stipulated. Indeed, if the public faith pledged in the British treaty did not forbid a renewal of those engagements with France, sound policy should prevent it. We should preserve to ourselves the right of allowing every commercial nation in amity with us the like shelter, supplies, and assistance, under like circumstances; and, by excluding all equally when engaged in war, (saving to each the rights of humanity and hospitality) we may keep the calamities of war at a distance. The engagements with Great Britain may cease in two years after the close of the present war: but, under the stipulations contained in the twenty-eighth and last articles of the British treaty, the engagements in question may be continued to a longer period. If, therefore, you should find any cogent reasons for renewing in substance the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the commercial treaty with France of 1778, it must be with the explicit declaration that neither at the present or any future time, shall the said articles be construed to derogate from the whole or any part of the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth articles of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, concluded at London on the 19th of November, 1794.

XXII. The present war has exhibited such inconveniences and mischiefs in our own country, and such monstrous abuses elsewhere, by trials, or pretended trials, and sales of prizes, by French consuls and agents: in order to prevent any claim to the exercise of such powers, it will be expedient expressly to declare they shall not be exercised in the United States; whether the prizes are made by public ships or privateers. There will, of course, be a reciprocal denial of the exercise of the like powers by American consuls and agents in the dominions of France. Prizes ought to be conducted to the country to which the captors belong, unless the two parties are engaged in hostilities against a common enemy. But, in this case, the established courts for prize causes in the country to which the prizes are conducted should alone take cognizance of them.

XXIII. The duties of an impartial neutrality, when either party shall remain neutral, will forbid any permission to the enemies of the other to arm originally, or to increase a former armament, in the ports of the neutral party.

XXIV. When one of the parties shall be engaged in war, the vessels of the other may be captured on just suspicion of having on board property belonging to the enemy of the former, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war. With these exceptions, the trade of each party to the ports of the enemies of the other should be perfectly free, unless to the ports actually blockaded; and if such enemies forbear to capture enemies' property in neutral vessels, it may be agreed that in such case, the contracting parties will forbear to capture the vessels of each other for that cause. The law of France of the 18th of January, 1798, respecting produce or manufactures coming from England or her possessions, is incompatible with the stipulation here proposed, and, if not repealed, negotiations with you must be deemed illusory.

But that captures on light suspicions may be avoided, and the vexations and injuries thence arising prevented, the usual stipulations for sea-letters or passports, and certificates or manifests of the cargoes of vessels, may be introduced. But neither party should be allowed to prescribe the form, or to require the exhibition of any document (the sea-letter and certificates before mentioned excepted) not required by the laws or usages of the party to whose citizens the vessels and their cargoes belong. The form of the sea-letter should be simple, like that now used by the United States, in that part of the passport which is printed in the English language.

When the quality of the ship, goods, and master shall sufficiently appear from the sea-letter and certificates, the commanders of armed vessels should exact no further proof. And if any merchant ship be not provided with a sea-letter or certificates, the case should be examined by a proper judge; and if it be found, from other proofs and documents, that the vessel truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties, it should not be liable to confiscation, but be released with its cargo, with the exception of enemies' property and contraband goods which may be found on board. The change of the master not to invalidate the passport.

XXV. The following articles, beyond the quantities proper for the ship's use, may be deemed contraband of war: cannon, mortars, their carriages and beds, muskets, petards, match, ball, bombs, grenades, carcasses, cartridge-boxes, gunpowder, saltpetre, pikes, halberds, swords, belts, pistols, holsters, cavalry saddles and furniture, and, generally, all kinds of arms and warlike instruments fit for the use of troops: and all these articles may be declared to be just objects of confiscation, whenever they are attempted to be carried to an enemy: but the vessel in which they are laden and the residue of the cargo to be free. France will probably not desire to extend further the use of contraband, and especially not to comprehend timber for ship building, naval stores, and other articles for the equipment of ships. If, however, she urges an extension, then timber for ship building, tar, pitch, turpentine, rosin, copper in sheets, sails, and sail cloth, hemp and cordage, may be added; and, generally, whatever may serve directly and principally for the equipment of vessels. But iron in pigs and bars, timber for house frames, pine or fir planks and boards, staves, nails suitable for house building, coarse linens, and, generally, all other articles which, though occasionally or from necessity applicable to the equipment of ships, are not directly and principally prepared for that purpose.

It is also probable that France will not desire to consider provisions as contraband, unless going to a place actually blockaded, and we ought strenuously to resist any other construction: but if what is said on this subject in the eighteenth article of our commercial treaty with Great Britain should induce France seriously and with earnestness to demand the like stipulation, it may be conceded: yet a modification may first be attempted, by proposing not only that if provisions be captured, they shall be promptly paid for, with a reasonable mercantile profit, freight, and demurrage, but that they shall not be captured at all unless going to a place actually blockaded, or to supply an invading army or hostile fleet, though in situations not actually forming an investment or blockade.

XXVI. If, on the exhibition of the certificates or manifests of a ship's cargo, the property of an enemy, or contraband goods, be discovered, and the ship be consequently captured and carried into port, provision must be made to prevent embezzlement, waste, and destruction.

But there is a very common regulation to prevent disorder and injury in stopping and examining neutral ships, which certainly is disregarded in practice, viz: That the examining ship shall not approach the neutral within cannon shot, while her boat is sent to make the examination. It is a rule which would produce both inconvenience and delay, and in bad weather be impracticable, or very dangerous. The provision that only two or three men shall enter the neutral vessel is very proper, though, like many other salutary regulations, is not enforced by penalties on offenders. But instead of visiting the neutral, the other often requires the neutral to send an officer with his papers. This is an abuse; and many instances have occurred in the present war, in which it has been practised with great inhumanity, and most when it was most inhuman—in tempestuous weather, when a boat could not be put out, but with imminent danger of the lives of the men. It will therefore be very well to stipulate that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel. And if this should in any cases prevent an examination, it can afford no just ground of complaint: for prima facie, better is the right of the neutral than of the belligerent vessel. Besides, the stipulation would be reciprocal.

XXVII. The usual stipulations in treaties, designed to prevent abuses by armed vessels, have ever been found inadequate: perhaps they do not admit of a complete remedy. If, however, any nation does not provide penalties and securies, whereby to restrain offenders and indemnify the injured, the nation itself ought to be responsible. Doubtless, the nation should be immediately responsible for all abuses committed by national ships.

One abuse is the destruction or concealment of papers of captured vessels. A remedy for this seems practicable: the captors may be obliged to give a receipt for them upon a list of the papers; and they may also be sealed up with the seals of the captors and captured.

The master and supercargo, being entrusted by the owners with the vessel and cargo, ought never to be separated from them. They may prevent waste and embezzlement, and, on the arrival of the vessel, will be ready for examination; and, also, to claim the property in behalf of the owners, and contest, as of right they may do, the legality of the capture.

Bribery, or an attempt to bribe any one of the ship's company or passengers to depose to any fact tending to the condemnation of vessel or cargo, or putting any of them to torture for that or any other purpose, should absolutely procure her acquittal.

But a still greater evil remains, and more difficult to remedy—the improper institution of prize courts. Probably no provision can be explicitly made, other than that each party will take effectual care that the judgments and decrees in prize causes shall be given conformably to the rules of justice and equity, and the stipulations of the treaty, and without any unnecessary delay, by judges above all suspicion, and who have no manner of interest in the cause in dispute. It would be some check on the judges in prize causes if their reasons for condemning were required to be stated, with the other proceedings, in writing; and copies of the whole should, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of the captured vessel without the smallest delay, or, at furthest, within fifteen days after sentence pronounced, and sooner if practicable, and at the expense of the captors, (in case of condemnation,) not of the captured, who are otherwise sufficiently distressed.

Prizes, as already observed, should be conducted into the ports of the party at war, or of an associate in the war, and there adjudicated by the regular tribunals. The French have conducted their prizes into neutral as well as belligerent ports; and, when there was no consul to try and condemn, leaving there the prizes, they have carried the papers to a distant place to find a French tribunal; and there, in the absence of the captured party, procured sentences of condemnation, and sold the prizes. The same mode of obtaining condemnations has been uniformly practised when they carried their prizes into the ports of an associate in the present war. But, without waiting for the result of this farcical trial, it has been common to unlade and sell the cargoes as soon as they reached a port.

An unreasonable burthen is imposed on the captured, in requiring them, if they think proper to appeal to a higher tribunal, to find sureties in large penalties, which, as strangers, it is impossible to procure. This evil demands redress.

The crews are often stripped of their property, and even of their clothes, and turned ashore without money or provisions. Such inhuman pillage is disgraceful to the nation which permits, or does not, by adequate punishments, restrain it. The masters, supercargoes, other officers and seamen, should be allowed certain sums; the former to employ counsel to support their claims to the property captured, and also for their subsistence; and the seamen might have an adequate allowance of good provisions until they could find vessels returning to their own country. To admit masters and supercargoes into the courts to defend the property captured, when they have been previously stripped of their money, and all means of providing the legal assistance essential to a right defence, is to tantalize with the semblance of justice, while the substance is denied.

XXVIII. If vessels of either party sail for a place actually blockaded by the other, without a previous knowledge of the blockade, every such vessel may be turned away, but not detained, nor her cargo, if not enemy's property, nor contraband, be confiscated, unless, after notice, she shall again attempt to enter. Nor should any vessel that may have entered prior to the blockade, be restrained from quitting such place with her return cargo; nor, if found there after the reduction of the place, should they be liable to any injury.

XXIX. If a war should break out between the two nations, six months after the proclamation thereof may be allowed to the merchants and others of each nation, residing in the dominions of the other, for selling and transporting their goods and merchandise. And if, during that term, any thing be taken from them, or injury done them, by either party, or the citizens or subjects of either party, full satisfaction should be made.

XXX. The articles of the treaty which you may conclude, as far as they respect compensation and payment for past injuries and contracts, should be permanent, until the objects thereof be fulfilled. So likewise the article to prevent the sequestration or confiscation of debts, and shares or moneys in the public funds, or in public or private banks, should endure, while on either side there is a subject on which to operate. The other articles of the treaty should terminate in ten or twelve years; a period as long as they will be likely to be mutually satisfactory.

The following points are to be considered as ultimated:

1. That an article be inserted for establishing a board, with suitable powers, to hear and determine the claims of our citizens, for the causes herein before expressed, and binding France to pay or secure payment of the sums which shall be awarded.
2. That the treaties and consular convention, declared to be no longer obligatory by act of Congress, be not in whole or in part revived by the new treaty; but that all the engagements, to which the United States are to become parties, be specified in the new treaty.
3. That no guaranty of the whole or any part of the dominions of France be stipulated, nor any engagement made, in the nature of an alliance.
4. That no aid or loan be promised in any form whatever.
5. That no engagement be made inconsistent with the obligations of any prior treaty; and, as it may respect our treaty with Great Britain, the instruction herein marked XXI. is to be particularly observed.
6. That no stipulation be made granting powers to consuls or others, under color of which tribunals can be established within our jurisdiction, or personal privileges be claimed by Frenchmen, incompatible with the complete sovereignty of the United States in matters of policy, commerce, and Government.
7. That the duration of the proposed treaty be limited to twelve years, at furthest, from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, with the exceptions respecting its permanence in certain cases, specified under the instruction marked XXX.

26. Letter to Judge Ellsworth and Governor Davie, mentioning the names of consuls and agents of the United States in Spain, Portugal and France.

Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie sailed from Newport, Rhode Island, on the 3d of November, having agreed to touch at Lisbon, before they made any port of France: arrived there on the 27th of November. Information of the revolution at Paris of the 18th Brumaire had just been received, and it was therefore thought expedient to remain long enough at that place, to form some judgment of the consequences of that change in the French Government: upon a conference on the 6th of December, the envoys resolved on the measures detailed in the following letter to the Secretary of State:

LISBON, December 7, 1799.

SIR:

We arrived at this place on the 27th ult. The late change in France, the circumstances of which we are informed will be fully detailed in Mr. Smith's despatches, and our desire to obtain a more accurate knowledge of the features and effects of this revolution before we entered that country, would have induced us to land in Holland, where we might join Mr. Murray, and be in a better situation to govern ourselves by circumstances: but Captain Barry apprehends it would hazard the frigate to attempt any port in Holland at this season of the year: we have, therefore, determined to sail immediately for L'Orient.

From L'Orient we shall probably proceed to Paris, if we can be satisfied that our present letters of credence will avail us. You will doubtless consider, sir, of the expediency of sending us, with your first despatches, other letters of credence addressed to the supreme executive of France, or in a manner more particular, which may introduce us, if necessary, or sanction the progress we may have made.

We have the honor, &c.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE.

The Hon. TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie, being detained nine days by contrary winds, sailed on the 21st of December for L'Orient: a succession of heavy gales and continued bad weather then rendering it apparently impracticable to reach that place, they authorized Captain Barry to make any port in France or Spain, and arrived at Corunna on the 16th of January, and the next day sent the following letter to Ch. M. Talleyrand, Minister of the Exterior Relations of the French republic, by a special courier:

CORUNNA, January 17, 1800.

The undersigned, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the French republic, have the honor to inform you of their arrival at this port, after a lapse of ten weeks since their leaving America, and the loss of four in a fruitless attempt to get from Lisbon, (where they touched) to L'Orient. From hence they will proceed immediately to the confines of France by land.

As they left the United States early in November, their letters of credence are, of course, addressed to "the Executive Directory of the French republic". This circumstance being a matter of mere formality, they are induced to suppose that no objection will arise out of it, and that their letters of credence will have the same effect as they would have under an address adapted to the present distribution of the powers of the French republic. Should the Government view this circumstance in the same light with the undersigned, they then request that passports may be granted for them and their suite to Paris, and that they may be forwarded by the courier charged with these despatches; and also that there may be granted, and that you would have the goodness to transmit, together with their letter to him, a like passport to William Vans Murray, Esq. at the Hague, who is joint envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, as before mentioned, with them.

They pray you, sir, to accept the assurances of their high respect,

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE.

To the MINISTER OF FOREIGN RELATIONS of the French republic.

The following is the letter forwarded to William Vans Murray, Esq. mentioned in the above:

CORUNNA, January 17, 1800.

DEAR SIR,

We enclose to you a copy of our note to the Minister of Foreign Relations of the French republic, from which you will learn our situation, and the steps we have taken to facilitate your progress and ours to Paris, where we hope soon to meet you for the accomplishment of a business which we all have so much at heart. Your letter of credence and your instructions are with us.

With much respect and esteem, we are, dear sir, your obedient servants,

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE.

WILLIAM VANS MURRAY, Esq.

The above envoys, in pursuance of the plan which they had adopted, of going to Paris by land, left Corunna on the 24th of January, and arrived at Burgos on the 9th of February, where they met the courier returning from Paris, with the following answer from the Minister of Exterior Relations:

PARIS, le 11 Pluviose, an 8 de la république Française.

MESSIEURS:

J'ai reçu la lettre datée de la Corogne, que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'écrire. Je regrette vivement qu'une navigation longue et penible ait retardé si longtemps votre arrivée en France. Vous êtes attendus avec impatience, vous serez reçus avec empressement. La forme donnée à vos lettres de créance ne sera point un obstacle à l'ouverture des négociations, dont j'ose prevoir l'heureux succès. Je n'ai rien eu de plus pressé, que de transmettre à Mr. Murray la lettre que vous m'aviez addressée pour lui, en y joignant les passeports nécessaires: de même que je joins ici ceux dont vous avez besoin. Je confie ce paquet, suivant vôtre désir, au courier que vous m'avez expédié.

Reçevez, Messieurs, l'assurance de ma haute considération.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Messieurs ELLSWORTH et DAVIE, Envoyés Extraordinaires et Ministres Plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis.

PARIS, 11*th Pluviose*, (30*th January*,) 8*th year of the French republic.*

GENTLEMEN:

I have received the letter dated at Corunna, which you have done me the honor to write. I regret exceedingly that an unpleasant and protracted voyage has so long delayed your arrival in France. You are expected with impatience, and will be received with warmth. The form which has been given to your letters of credence will occasion no obstacle to the opening of a negotiation, from which I dare anticipate the happiest results. No time will be lost in transmitting to Mr. Murray the letter intrusted to my care, to which will be added the necessary passports. The requisite passports will also be forwarded to you. Agreeably to your desire, I confide this packet to the courier whom you have despatched.

Receive, gentlemen, the assurance of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Messrs. ELLSWORTH AND DAVIE,
Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States.

Captain Barry having received directions from the envoys to wait the return of the courier to Corunna, in order to take their despatches for the Government, the following letter was written to the Secretary of State:

SIR: BURGOS, February 10, 1800.

We have the pleasure to enclose to you a copy of our letter No. 1. dated at Lisbon, and forwarded from St. Ubes. We were detained in the Tagus by contrary winds till the 21st of December, when we sailed for L'Orient, under the expectation of making that port in seven or eight days; but, on the 24th, we encountered a severe gale, which blew with little intermission until the 2d of January, at which time it was ascertained that we had drifted as far as latitude 50, and to the west of Cape Clear. Observing that Captain Barry was extremely apprehensive of approaching any part of the French coast, on the Bay of Biscay, in bad weather, and as so much time had been already lost, we directed him to land us in any port of France or Spain that he could make with safety and convenience: he thought proper to choose the port of Corunna, and anchored in the Bay of Ares, a few leagues from that place, on the 11th of January. Being anxious to make the necessary preparations for our journey to Paris, and the wind continuing unfavorable for the sailing of the frigate to Corunna, we landed at the village of Puente d'Eume, and, immediately after our arrival at Corunna, despatched a courier to Paris, with a letter addressed to the Minister of Foreign Relations, desiring the necessary passports, (a copy of which is inclosed, marked A.) covering also a letter to Mr. Murray, a copy of which (marked B.) you will receive under this enclosure.

The necessary arrangements were made to meet the courier at Burgos, or Victoria, and he fortunately reached this place yesterday, a few hours before our arrival, charged with the despatches (marked C.) from Ch. M. Talleyrand, Minister of Exterior Relations, enclosing the passports requested in our letter written at Corunna.

We regret exceedingly the time that must be consumed in a long and tedious journey by land, in the most rigorous and unfavorable season of the year; but after the ineffectual attempt to go to L'Orient by water, this measure appeared indispensable, notwithstanding any difficulties with which it might be connected. We expect to leave this place to-morrow, and flatter ourselves with the hope of arriving in Paris about the first of March.

We have the honor to be, &c.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE.

The Honorable TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

The envoys set out from Burgos on the 11th of February, and, taking the route by Bayonne, arrived in Paris on the 2d of March, where Mr. Murray had also arrived the preceding day.

The following was delivered by Mr. Murray, as an extract from his journal.

Mr. Semonville, the French minister at the Hague, called on me on the 4th February, and delivered to me a packet from Mr. Talleyrand, containing a passport, a letter from my colleagues Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie, dated at Corunna, and the following letter:

PARIS, le 11 Pluviose, an 8 de la république Française.

MONSIEUR:

Je reçois la nouvelle, qu'après une navigation longue et difficile, les plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis sont arrivés à la Corogne. Ils m'ont fait passer la lettre cy incluse que je m'empresse de vous envoyer. Je prends soin d'y joindre le passeport qui vous est nécessaire pour vous rendre à Paris, espérant que vous ne differiez pas à vous mettre en route pour vous réunir à vos collègues, et me felicitant de voir enfin arriver le moment où une discussion franche et approfondie va mettre un terme à toutes difficultés entre la république Française et les Etats Unis, et rendre aux rapports des deux nations l'harmonie parfaite qu'ils n'eussent jamais du perdre.

Reçevez, Monsieur, l'assurance de ma haute considération.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

P. S. J'ai l'honneur de vous annoncer, Monsieur, que je fais partir aujourd'hui même par le courier extraordinaire que MM. Ellsworth et Davie m'avaient expédié les passports qu'ils me demandent. Vous serez à même de calculer le moment de leur arrivée à Paris.

A MONSIEUR MURRAY, Envoye Extraordinaire des Etats Unis, à la Haye.

PARIS, 11*th Pluviose*, (30*th January*,) 8*th year of the French Republic.*

SIR:

I have received information that the plenipotentiaries of the United States, after a long and difficult voyage, have arrived at Corunna. They have forwarded to me the enclosed letter, which I hasten to transmit to you. I avail myself of this occasion to enclose a passport, which may be necessary on your repairing to Paris. While indulging the hope that you will speedily join your colleagues, I felicitate myself upon the prospect that the time will soon arrive, when, by a frank and full discussion, a termination will be put to the difficulties existing between the republic of France and the United States, and when the two nations will be restored to that friendly and harmonious intercourse which ought never to have been suspended.

Receive, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

P. S. I have the honor to inform you that I have to-day despatched, by the courier who arrived with the note from Messrs. Ellsworth and Davie, the passports which they required. You may, therefore, calculate the time when they will arrive at Paris:

To Mr. MURRAY, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States at the Hague.

To which I returned the following answer:

THE HAGUE, 4*th February*, 1800.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

Mr. Semonville, the minister plenipotentiary of the French republic, had the goodness to-day to deliver to me himself the letter of the 31st ultimo, which you did me the honor to write, enclosing passports for myself, family, and baggage, and a letter from my colleagues Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie: accept my thanks for this communication.

I shall immediately prepare for my new destination, one from which I now permit myself to hope a restoration of that harmony which certainly ought not to have been so cruelly interrupted.

May I ask a repetition of an act of politeness in requesting that the enclosed may be delivered to my colleagues, who I hope will be in Paris immediately. Accept, citizen minister, the assurance of my high consideration.

W. V. MURRAY.

To CITIZEN TALLEYRAND, Minister of the Exterior Relations of the French republic.

On the 10th, I requested personally of Mr. Vemder Goes, the Minister of Exterior Relations, an audience of leave. This was fixed for the 13th, when I took a temporary leave of the Batavian Directory, and on the 17th set out for Paris.

The severity of the season, and a two days' illness of Mrs. Murray on the road, prevented me from making a journey, generally made in five days, in less than thirteen. On Saturday evening, the 1st March, I arrived at Paris, and the next day had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie arrive.

MARCH 3*d*.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Messrs. Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

GENTLEMEN:

I have the honor to inform you that the First Consul of the republic has just appointed citizens Joseph Bonaparte, ex-ambassador at Rome, Fleurieu, late Minister of Marine, and Rœderer, counsellor of state, ministers plenipotentiary, to treat with you concerning the differences existing between the two nations, to effect the accommodation which they mutally desire, and to fulfil the wish, expressed by the two Governments, to remove a misunderstanding which comports as little with their interests as with their sentiments.

Receive, gentlemen, the assurance of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

PARIS, March 9, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister of Exterior Relations of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

The undersigned, envoys extraordinary of the United States, have the honor to acknowledge your letter of yesterday, announcing to them that the Premier Consul of the republic had named the citizens Joseph Bonaparte, ex-ambassador at Rome, Fleurieu, late Minister of Marine, and Rœderer, counsellor of state, as ministers plenipotentiary to treat with them on the differences existing between the French republic and the United States of America.

The Government of the United States, being always assured that the interests of both nations would be essentially promoted by the re-establishment of confidence and harmony between the two countries, is sincerely desirous to adjust all existing differences, and to restore between them that understanding and friendly intercourse so congenial to her wishes, and so essential to their mutual prosperity.

The agreeable and interesting task of effecting these great objects has been committed, on the part of the United States, to the undersigned, and they will be ready to enter upon that business as soon as the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic shall signify that they are ready to commence the negotiation.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of their high consideration.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

The envoys of the United States having thus informed the Minister of Exterior Relations of their readiness to enter on the business of the negotiation, as soon as it would be convenient for the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic, they waited until the 14th for some intimation from them on that subject: none, however, being then received, they agreed to address the following note to Messieurs Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Rœderer, the ministers announced in the above communication:

PARIS, March 15, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

MINISTERS:

The undersigned had the pleasure to be informed of your appointment as ministers plenipotentiary to treat with them on the differences existing between the French republic and the United States, by a letter from the Minister of Exterior Relations, under the date of the 18th Ventose.

The necessary previous measures appearing now to be taken by both Governments, it remains with their ministers to have their wishes fulfilled: and the undersigned permit themselves to hope that the strange phenomenon of a misunderstanding between the French republic and the United States of America will soon disappear. They will have the honor to meet the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic at such time and place as they may prefer, for the exchange of powers, and to learn how soon it will be convenient for them to commence the negotiation.

Accept, ministers, the assurances of their high consideration.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

MARCH 27*th*.

The envoys had received no answer to their note of the 15th, but had been informed, verbally, that the delay was much regretted by the French Government and the ministers, and that it was occasioned by the indisposition of Mr. Joseph Bonaparte, president of the French commission, who, in a note to the envoys, of this date, announced his recovery. The French ministers, however, continuing silent, the envoys addressed the following note to them, on the morning of the 29th: and, in the afternoon of the same day, received the note under date of the 8th Germinal, (same date.)

PARIS, March 29, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to citizens J. Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Rœderer, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned are happy to learn that the indisposition of Mr. Bonaparte, which has so unfortunately retarded the commencement of the negotiation, is at length removed: and, impressed as they are with the importance of their mission, and the urgency of existing circumstances, they take again the liberty to express their solicitude that an early day may be named, at which it will be convenient for you to honor the undersigned with an interview, for the purpose of effecting the object of their last note. Accept, citizen ministers, &c.

JOHN ADAMS, President of the United States of America. To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas, by letters patent under the seal of the United States, and dated on the 26th day of February last, I did, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, appoint Oliver Ellsworth, Chief Justice of the United States, Patrick Henry, late Governor of Virginia, and William Vans Murray, minister resident of the United States at the Hague, to be envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic, thereby giving and granting to them full powers, for and in the name of the United States, to meet and confer with the minister or ministers of the French republic, who should be appointed and commissioned with equal powers, and with such minister or ministers to discuss and settle by a treaty all controversies between the United States and France, transmitting such treaty to the President of the United States of America, for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, if such advice and consent shall be given; and whereas, the said Patrick Henry did signify to me that, from his bodily infirmities, being unable to execute his said appointment, he declined accepting the same: now know ye, that reposing especial trust and confidence in the integrity, prudence and abilities of William Richardson Davie, late Governor of the State of North Carolina, I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, do appoint him an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic, in the room of the said Patrick Henry, hereby giving and granting to him, and to the said Oliver Ellsworth and William Vans Murray, full powers for and in the name of the United States, to meet and confer with the minister or ministers of the French republic, who shall be appointed and commissioned with equal powers, and with such minister or ministers to discuss and settle by a treaty all controversies between the United States and France, transmitting such treaty to the President of the United States of America for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, if such advice and consent shall be given.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States of America to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the city of Philadelphia, the tenth day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-fourth.

JOHN ADAMS.

By the President:

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

The envoys, after withdrawing, proceeded immediately to consider the copy of the powers delivered by the French ministers; and, as they appeared to them not sufficiently full and explicit to authorize them to commence the negotiation, under the limitation of their own powers, they addressed the following note to the French ministers on the next day.

PARIS, April 3, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned envoys, having conferred on the copy delivered to them yesterday of the powers granted to you to negotiate with them concerning the existing differences between the French republic and the United States, feel themselves compelled to represent to you the doubts they entertain whether the terms in which those powers are expressed are sufficiently full and explicit. You will please to observe that the powers with which the undersigned are invested, authorize them to discuss and settle by a treaty all controversies between the United States and France, and they suppose it may be considered as questionable, at least, whether the same latitude of power may be given by the expression, "à l'effet de négocier avec les ministres, &c. sur les différends survenus entre les deux états;' and if it could be inferred from any construction of the terms used in the commission, that to negotiate respecting the existing differences implied a power to settle them also by treaty, yet the undersigned conceive that it would not be advisable to act upon powers deduced by implication from terms in their own nature indefinite, in the same manner as if they had been fully and explicitly expressed. Upon examining the copy of the commission, which the undersigned had the honor to deliver to you yesterday, you will observe the nature and extent of their powers, and that they can only negotiate with ministers of the French republic, who may be commissioned with equal powers. This circumstance, it is hoped, will satisfy the ministers of the French republic, that the undersigned have not attached to this objection an unnecessary importance, and evince to them the propriety of procuring from their Government powers commensurate with those granted by the Government of the United States.

While the undersigned regret any trouble or delay that this circumstance may occasion, they are happy that the situation of the ministers of the French republic will enable them to remove the difficulty without any considerable inconvenience to the negotiation.

The envoys of the United States have the highest confidence in the upright views and frank disposition of the French Government, and hope it will do them the justice to believe that they are actuated only by a respect to that duty which their commission and instructions prescribe. Accept &c.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WM. R. DAVIE,
WM. V. MURRAY.

APRIL 8.

Received the following letter from the French ministers, under the date of the 17th Germinal, (7th April) enclosing a copy of the new powers, and a copy of a letter from the Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, le 16 Germinal, an 8.

Le Ministre des Relations Extérieures aux Ministres Plénipotentiaires chargés de négocier avec les Envoyés des Etats Unis.

J'ai réçu, citoyens, vos lettres de 13 et 14 de ce mois, (No. 1 et 2,) avec les pièces qui y sont annoncées.

Par la première, vous m'informer de l'échange que vous avez fait de vos pouvoirs avec MM. les ministres Américains; et dans la séconde, vous me faites part de la note qui ces ministres vous ont adressée sur l'insuffisance qu'ils croyent trouver dans les pouvoirs qui vous leur avez remis.

Pour donner à Messieurs les ministres des Etats Unis une preuve non équivoque de l'esprit dans lequel il désire conduire la négociation, le Premier Consul, à qui j'ai soumis vos dépêches, a cru devoir vous donner des pouvoirs plus spéciaux et plus explicites que ne le sont ceux de son premier arrêté. Vous voudriez bien les remettre à ces ministres, toutefois, en leur faisant observer que dans nos usages diplomatiques depuis la révolution, nos négociateurs ont presque toujours été accrédités et autorisés par des simples arretés, comme celui dont vous avez fait l'échange, et que dans ces arrêtés toujours l'expression négocier a emporté l'autorisation de conclure. D'après celà, j'aurais pu me borner à vous donner ministériellement cette explication, et Messieurs les ministres Américains, comme ils l'ont eux mêmes témoignés, l'auraient acceptée. Mais le Premier Consul a préféré l'autre voye, afin comme je vous l'ai dit plus haut, de léver toutes les difficultés de formes qui pourraient jetter du délai ou de l'embarras dans la marche de la négociation. Salut et fraternité,

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to the Ministers Plenipotentiary appointed to negotiate with the Envoys of United States.

I have received, citizens, your letters of the 13th and 14th of this month, (Nos. 1 and 2,) with the copies therein referred to.

By the first, you inform me of the exchange which you have made of your powers with the American ministers: and, in the second, you communicate an extract of the note which these ministers have addressed to you, respecting the insufficiency which they suppose to exist in the powers you have exchanged with them.

The First Consul, to whom I have submitted your despatches, in order to present to the ministers of the United States an unequivocal proof of the spirit in which he desires to conduct the negotiation, has thought proper to furnish you with powers still more special and explicit than those contained in his first decree. In transmitting them, however, to the American ministers, you will be pleased to apprize them that, in our diplomatic usages, since the revolution, our negotiators have almost always been accredited and empowered by simple decrees, similar to the one which you have placed in their hands; and that in these decrees the expression "to negotiate" has always imported an authority "to conclude." I might have confined myself, indeed, to giving you, officially, this explanation; and the American ministers, as they have themselves declared, would have been content with receiving it. But the First Consul has preferred the other mode, for the purpose, as I have already stated, of removing all the obstacles of mere form which could delay or embarrass the progress of the negotiation.

Safety and fraternity.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française, soussignés, ont l'honneur d'accuser à Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires et ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis d'Amérique, la reception de la lettre qu'ils leur ont adressée sous la date du 13 de ce mois.

Les ministres François ont attendu pour y répondre l'issue du référé qu'ils se sont empressés de faire de cette note à leur Gouvernement. Ils en ont reçu la réponse; et les nouveaux pouvoirs dont ils ont l'honneur d'adresser la copie ci-jointe aux ministres des Etats Unis, Messieurs les ministres Américains verront, dans la manière dont le Premier Consul de la république a lévé les doutes, et dans les explications contenues dans la lettre du Ministre des Relations Extérieures, de nouveaux motifs de confiance. Les ministres de la république, présumant que rien n'entravera plus l'ouverture de la discussion, attendent le mémoire qui leur a été annoncé dans la conférence du 12 de la part de Messieurs les ministres des Etats Unis.

Ils les prient de vouloir bien recevoir l'assurance de leur haute considération.

PARIS, the 17*th Germinal*, (7*th April*) year 8.

The undersigned, ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic, have the honor to inform the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, that their letter, dated the 13th of this month, has been received.

In order to reply to this letter, the French ministers have awaited the result of its reference to their Government, which they hastened to make. The answer which they received is enclosed. In the new powers, of which they have the honor to transmit the subjoined copy, the American ministers will perceive the manner in which the First Consul of the republic has removed the doubt which they expressed; and in the explanations contained in the letter of the Minister of Exterior Relations, they will not fail to discover new motives of confidence. The ministers of the republic, presuming that no obstacle will now oppose the opening of the negotiation, expect to receive, on the part of the ministers of the United States, the memorial which was announced at the conference of the 12th instant.

They pray them to receive the assurance of their high consideration.

Extract from the Register of the Decrees of the First Consul of the republic.

PARIS, 15*th Germinal* (5*th March,*)
Year 8*th of the republic, one and indivisible.*

In the name of the French People: Bonaparte, First Consul of the republic, decrees as follows:

Citizens Joseph Bonaparte, Rœderer, and Fleurieu, appointed, by the decree of the 13th Ventose, (3d March) last, ministers plenipotentiary, to negotiate with the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of America upon the differences existing between the two nations, are authorized to negotiate with the said ministers upon all that concerns these differences; as well as to sign and conclude, in the name of the republic, whatever shall to them appear necessary to effect a perfect re-establishment of good harmony. To this end, therefore, citizens Bonaparte, Rœderer, and Fleurieu receive, by this decree, full and complete powers.

BONAPARTE.

By the First Consul: the Secretary of State,
HUGUES B. MARET.

An exact copy: the Minister of Exterior Relations,

RŒDERER.

The following answer was returned to the above communication, accompanied by a note under the same date, sketching the plan on which the envoys proposed to open the negotiation. This proposition produced a discussion detailed in the following correspondence up to the 17th April, inclusive; when the envoys considered the way sufficiently prepared to authorize them to offer some details in the form of articles of a treaty, respecting the claims of individuals.

PARIS, April 7, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to the citizens Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Rœderer, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned have great pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of the note which you did them the honor of addressing to them to day, covering the arrêté of new powers, and the copy of the letter to you from the Minister of Exterior Relations. That minister, they are happy to see, has done them justice upon the interpretation which they had presumed to be the correct one of the terms in question; and as they unite with you in the wish to press forward the negotiation, they believe that, in transmitting the note which accompanies this, and which was promised on the 12th of Germinal, they at once meet the frankness of your views, and give to you a certain demonstration of the confidence with which the justice and principles of the Government of the French republic have inspired them.

Accept, citizen ministers, the assurance of their high consideration.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WM. R. DAVIE,
WM. V. MURRAY.

PARIS, April 7, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to the citizens Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Rœderer, Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned, appreciating the value of time, and wishing by frankness to evince their sincerity, enter directly on the great object of their mission, an object which they believe may be best obtained by avoiding to retrace too minutely the too well known and too painful incidents which have rendered a negotiation necessary. To satisfy the demands of justice, and render a reconciliation cordial and permanent, they propose an arrangement, such as shall be compatible with national honor and existing circumstances, to ascertain and discharge the equitable claims of the citizens of either nation upon the other, whether founded on contract, treaty, or the law of nations. The way being thus prepared, the undersigned will be at liberty to stipulate for that reciprocity and freedom of commercial intercourse between the two countries, which must essentially contribute to their mutual advancement. Should this general view of the subject be approved by the ministers plenipotentiary, to whom it is addressed, the details, it is presumed, may be easily adjusted, and that confidence restored which ought never to have been shaken.

Accept, &c.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WM. R. DAVIE,
WM. V. MURRAY.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ont lû attentivement la proposition du plan de négociation, qui leur est communiqué par Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires et ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis d'Amérique.

Ils pensent que le premier objet des négociations doit être la détermination des règles et la marche à suivre pour l'appréciation et l'indemnité des dommages, à raison desquels, l'une des deux nations peut avoir des réclamations à former pour elle-même, ou pour quelqu'un de ses citoyens.

Et que le sécond objet est d'assurer l'exécution des traités d'amitié et de commerce, faits entre les deux nations, et l'accomplissement des vues d'avantages réciproques qui les ont dictés.

Les soussignés observent, au reste, que la république Française n'autorisant aucune mésure qui puisse fournir prétexte d'inquiétude au commerce Americain, un préliminaire très favorable à la négociation serait que Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires et ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis voulussent bien faire connoître aux ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française les ordres qui, sans doute, ont été donnés par le Président des Etats Unis pour faire cesser l'effet des actes du Congrès, qui sont sortis de termes de la bonne intelligence, dont les deux nations ont un égal désir.

PARIS, 19*th Germinal*, (9*th April*,) year 8.

The ministers of the French republic have perused with attention the plan proposed by the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States for conducting the negotiation.

They are of opinion that the first object should be, to determine the rules, and the mode of procedure, for the valuation and indemnification of those injuries for which the two nations, respectively, may have demands against each other, whether these demands are founded on national injuries or individual claims.

And that the second object is, to ensure the execution of the treaties of friendship and commerce, now existing between the two nations, and the accomplishment of those views of reciprocal advantage which first dictated them.

The undersigned have only, in addition, to observe, that, as no measures are authorized by the Government of France affording the least ground of inquietude to the American commerce, they would consider it a preliminary favorable to the negotiation, if the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States will be pleased to communicate the orders, no doubt issued by the President of the United States, to discontinue the operation of the acts of Congress, the enforcement of which must be viewed as repugnant to that good understanding for which both nations have expressed an equal desire.

The undersigned pray the ministers plenipotentiary of America to receive the assurance of their high consideration.

BONAPARTE,
FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

PARIS, April 11, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned have seen with pleasure in your note which they had the honor to receive yesterday, an acquiescence in the principle of compensating equitable claims of citizens on both sides; though you have proposed to include also claims which either nation might have for herself.

This description of claims was omitted in the proposition of the undersigned, not from the apprehension of an unfavorable balance, but because in their nature they were difficult to define and limit, because their discussion might be unpleasant and dilatory, and because, also, to insist on pecuniary compensation for themselves, would be incompatible with that magnanimity which it was presumed both nations would prefer in an act of accommodation, so auspicious to their future prosperity. If, however, after considering these objections, and others which will suggest themselves, the ministers of the French republic shall deem it necessary to provide pecuniary compensation for such claims, the undersigned will be ready further to consider the question at a convenient stage of the negotiation, which they apprehend will be after it shall be seen what arrangement would be acceptable for the claims of citizens.

The expectation of the undersigned, with regard to commerce, is not to renew or amend the former treaty, but to propose a new one, which shall have fewer difficulties of construction and execution; shall more extend the provisions for intercourse, and better adapt them to the existing state of things; and they trust that, when the negotiation shall have sufficiently progressed to take up this branch of it more particularly, their expectation will be shown to be reasonable.

Any recent acts of the French republic, having for their object to remove from the American commerce causes of disquietude, will be duly estimated in America, and be perceived to have strengthened the ground for returning confidence, when there shall have been time for it.

With respect to the acts of the Congress of the United States, which the hard alternative of abandoning their commerce to ruin imposed, and which, far from contemplating a co-operation with the enemies of the republic, did not even authorize reprisals upon her merchantmen, but were restricted simply to the giving of safety to their own, till a moment should arrive when their sufferings could be heard and redressed: of these acts the undersigned do not know that the President of the United States has suspended their effect, except in the instance of saving St. Domingo from famine. But, without doubt, their effects will wholly cease as soon as it can be well assured that the necessity which imposed them no longer exists: of which the undersigned hope their mission will be regarded as a sufficient pledge.

Should it appear to the ministers of the French republic, from these explanations, made with a frankness equal to the candor with which they are sure to be examined, that the way is prepared to bring forward an arrangement for the claims of citizens, the undersigned will soon have the honor to offer for their consideration some details on that subject. Accept, &c.

WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

PARIS, le 23 Germinal, an 8.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ne voyent aucun obstacle qui s'oppose à ce que Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires et ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis fassent connoitre les considérations auxquelles ils se sont arrêtés, au sujet des arrangements, à prendre sur les réclamations des particuliers d'une nation à l'egard de l'autre. Ces réclamations ne pouvant être appréciés de part ou d'autre que par la discussion des principes du droit des gens, ou les dispositions des traités, les réclamations nationales seront pour la plupart implicitement appréciés quand celles des particuliers le seront. Les stipulations nationales ne seront que des conséquences ultérieures des mêmes principes.

La question de savoir s'il convient de faire un nouveau traité ne pourra être resolue qu'après que les discussions qui auront eu lieu rélativement aux réclamations individuelles et nationales auront determinés l'application qu'il convient de faire des principes du droit des gens, et fixés avec précision le sens des anciens traités. Ce sera seulement après avoir eclairci les doutes élevés à cet égard, qu'il sera possible aux ministres plénipotentiaires des deux nations de reconnoitre si les anciens traités suffisent ou non à leurs intérêts.

Au reste, les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ne peuvent voir sans peine que Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis ignorent si leur Gouvernement a fait cesser l'état hostile où il s'est mis à l'égard de la France.

Le Gouvernement Français ayant rapporté divers réglemens qui avaient inquiété le Gouvernement Fédéral en ayant public plusieurs autres dans la vue de rétablir la bonne harmonie, étant prêt à faire encore tout ce que la justice pourra demander pour faire cesser tout souvenir irritant, il etait en droit d'attendre, entre autres témoignages de réciprocité, que les vaisseaux armées des Etats Unis ne continueraient pas plus longtemps à attaquer les bâtimens de la république, et que l'effusion du sang humain ne serait pas à craindre.

Ainsi pour que la négociation ne puisse être troublée par des incidens fâcheux, il serait nécessaire que Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis voulussent bien donner aux ministres plénipotentiaires de la république l'assurance que leur Gouvernement fera cesser sans rétard l'état hostile où il se maintient à l'égard de la France. Cette assurance, fortement provoqué par les actes du Gouvernement Français à qui il promettroit une juste réciprocité, ne serait qu'un légitime échange de celle qui est contenue dans les présentes.

Les soussignés prient Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires et ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis d'agréer l'assurance de leur haute considération.

The Ministers of France to the American Envoys.

PARIS, 23*d Germinal,* (14*th April,*) year 8.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic do not perceive, from the considerations suggested rather than developed by the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, any obstacle to arrangements which it may be proper to make, on the subject of the individual claims of one nation upon the other. It being impossible, on the part of either, to estimate these claims except by the discussion of the principles of the law of nations and the obligations of treaties, the national claims will, for the most part, be impliedly estimated by the value affixed to those of individuals. National stipulations will be only the ulterior consequences of admitted principles.

The question, therefore, whether it is expedient to form a new treaty, cannot be answered until after a discussion, in which the meaning of ancient treaties shall be determined, the principles of the laws of nations unfolded, and the application of these principles to the claims brought forward, whether national or individual, clearly shown. It is only when the doubts thus raised shall be removed, that the ministers plenipotentiary of the two nations will be able to determine whether the ancient treaties will suffice to their interests or not.

Finally, the ministers of the French republic cannot see without concern that the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States are uninformed of any revocation of the hostile measures which their Government has adopted with regard to France. The French Government, after rescinding several regulations which had given inquietude to the Federal Government; after publishing many others for the purpose of re-establishing perfect harmony; after professing, also, a readiness to do all that justice shall demand, in order to efface every irritating remembrance; had a right to expect, with other evidences of reciprocity, that the armed vessels of the United States should cease to attack the vessels of the republic, and that the effusion of human blood should no longer be feared.

To prevent the interruption of the negotiation by vexatious incidents like these, it is necessary that the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States shall give an assurance to the ministers plenipotentiary of the republic, that their Government will terminate, without delay, the hostile condition which it now maintains in relation to France. This assurance, strongly demanded by the acts of the French Government, to which a just reciprocity has been promised, can only be considered a legitimate exchange for that herein contained.

The undersigned pray the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to accept the assurances of their high consideration.

BONAPARTE,
FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

PARIS, April 17, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned have been favored with your note of the 23d of Germinal.

With respect to the assurances desired of them that measures of the United States, which had been resorted to for the protection of their commerce, should immediately cease, they must explicitly declare that they are not authorized to give assurances, otherwise than by incorporating them in a treaty, it having been expected by their Government that, in that way, every necessary assurance on both sides would so soon be given as to render preliminary provisions of little use; and which expectation the undersigned yet confidently trust will not be disappointed.

Should they, however, be favored with copies of recent repeals of regulations, which had given disquietude to the United States, and of other regulations lately adopted with a view of re-establishing harmony, it would be as well their pleasure as their duty to transmit the same in the most favorable manner to their Government, which would be sure, in the conciliatory temper it has evinced, to receive from them very fully the correspondent impressions they are adapted to make. Penetrated as the undersigned are with the interests which both nations have in returning to a good understanding, they receive with sensibility a pledge of that event in the declaration, that the French republic is ready to do all that justice can require to obliterate every irritating remembrance.

The undersigned, conceiving that the way is now prepared, have the honor to offer for consideration some details respecting the claims of individuals. They have preferred to offer them at once in the form of articles of the treaty, as containing a full and frank expression of their views; and as a mean by which the principles can be discussed connected directly with their application; as the most probable way of fixing the attention of the ministers on both sides upon the points of difference of opinion, if any such exist; and as affording the most certain prospect of progressing in the business. And they have no doubt that in those articles or propositions will be seen a spirit of accommodation as well as of justice. Accept, &c.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and a true and sincere friendship, between the French republic and the United States of America, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. Whereas complaints have been made by divers merchants and others, citizens of the United States, that, during the course of the war in which the French republic is now engaged, they have sustained considerable losses and damage, by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, and by reason of irregular or illegal seizures or detentions of their vessels and other property in ports and places within the jurisdiction or dominions of the said republic, all under color of authority or commissions from the same; for which losses and damage they have failed, without manifest neglect or wilful omission on their part, to obtain adequate compensation: it is agreed that, in all such cases, full and complete compensation shall be made by the Government of the French republic.

And whereas complaints have also been made by divers merchants and others, citizens of the French republic, that under color of authority or commissions from the United States; for which losses and damage they have failed, without manifest negligence or wilful omission on their part, to obtain adequate compensation: it is agreed that, in all such cases, full and complete compensation shall be made by the Government of the United States.

That, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of any such losses and damage sustained either by citizens of the United States or of the French republic, five commissioners shall be appointed and authorized to meet and act in the following manner, viz:

When the five commissioners thus appointed shall first meet, they shall, before they proceed to act, respectively take the following oath or affirmation, in the presence of each other; which oath or affirmation, being so taken and duly attested, shall be entered on the records of their proceedings, viz:

I, A. B. one of the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the second article of the treaty of ——, between the French republic and the United States of America, do solemnly swear or affirm that I will honestly, diligently, impartially, and carefully examine all such complaints as, under the said article, shall be preferred to the said commissioners, and the same will decide to the best of my judgment, according to the rules and principles of decision expressed and contained in the said treaty of ——. I will also, in like manner, examine all such complaints as, under the fifth article of said treaty, shall be preferred to the said commissioners, and will decide them to the best of my judgment, according to justice and equity; and that I will forbear to act as commissioner in any case in which I am personally interested.

Two years, from the day on which the commissioners shall form a board, and be ready to proceed to business, are assigned for receiving complaints and applications; but the commissioners are nevertheless authorized, in any particular case in which it shall appear to them reasonable and just, to extend the said term of two years for any term not exceeding six months after the expiration thereof. The commissioners shall be appointed, and meet at ——, within six months from the ratifications of this treaty by the respective Governments, and as much sooner as may be.

The commissioners, in examining the complaints and applications so preferred to them, shall have power to examine all such persons as shall come before them, on oath or affirmation, touching the premises; and also to receive in evidence, according as they may think most consistent with justice and equity, all written depositions, or books, or papers, or copies, or extracts thereof; every such deposition, or book, or paper, or copy, or extract, being duly authenticated, either according to the legal forms now existing in the two countries, or in such other manner as the said commissioners shall see cause to require or allow. They shall not, in examining claims under this article, be concluded either as to law or facts, by any judicial decision, sentence, or decree, which has been had or rendered therein. And they shall decide the claims in question according to the original merits of the several cases, and to justice, equity, and the law of nations; and in all cases of complaint existing prior to the 7th of July, 1798, according to the treaties and consular convention then existing between France and the United States.

The award of said commissioners, or any board of them, as hereinbefore provided for, shall be final and conclusive as to the justice of the claim, and the amount of the sum to be paid to the creditor or claimant. And they shall comprehend, when in favor of a claimant, a reasonable allowance of interest on the original losses or damage, computed up to the time when the award is to be performed.

And it is also further agreed, that not only the now existing cases, of all the descriptions before named, but all such as shall exist at the time of exchanging the ratifications of this treaty, shall be considered as being within the provisions, intent, and meaning of this article.

ART. 3. The French republic, desirous, in an adjustment of differences with the United States, to give them a proof of her liberality, by waiving formal exceptions, and narrowing the ground of discussion, does agree that such claims of the citizens of the United States for compensation as shall be in other respects fair and equitable, shall not be prejudiced by reason of not having on board their vessels, when captured, any other passport or sea-letter than such as had been usually furnished by their Government prior to the 2d day of March, 1797, or any other ship's rôle d'équipage, or other shipping paper, than had been generally used by the citizens of the United States prior to that date; nor shall their claims be prejudiced by reason of having on board their vessels, when captured, merchandise, the manufacture or production of any particular country or place.

ART. 4. Any sum which shall be awarded by the said commissioners, pursuant to the second article of this treaty, in favor of a claimant, a citizen of the United States, the Government of the French republic will, on the condition of such releases or assignments, to be given by him, as the said commissioners may direct, cause to be paid to such claimant, in silver or gold coin, without deduction, at Paris, within three months after the date of the award; or will then cause the sum so awarded to be converted into transferable stock or capital, bearing an interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum; which interest and principal the said Government will cause to be paid in silver or gold coin, without deduction, to such claimant, or his transferee at Paris, viz: the interest annually, and the principal by three equal instalments, viz: one-third in three years, one-third in five years, and the remaining third in seven years from the date of the award. The form of the security or securities and the mode of transfer to be such as the said commissioners shall prescribe. And any sum which shall be so awarded in favor of a claimant, a citizen of the French republic, the Government of the United States will, within six months after the date of the award, upon like condition, and in like manner and time, cause to be paid, or secure to be paid, to such claimant, or his transferee, at the city of Washington.

ART. 5. And whereas complaints have been made by divers merchants and others, citizens of the United States, that the French Government is indebted to them, by contract, in considerable sums, for provisions and other property received from them in France and other places within the jurisdiction or dominions of the said republic, and for freight and use of their vessels to transport provisions and other property and prisoners, all since the commencement of the war in which the French republic is now engaged, for a part of which debts they hold certificates and bills, issued and drawn by officers and agents of the republic, payable in France and in other places; and that, although they have used due diligence, it has never been in their power to obtain payment of said debts, certificates, or bills: it is agreed that, in such cases, the claimants may, if they see fit, prefer their claims to the commissioners provided in the second article, who are authorized to proceed respecting the same as to the time of their reception, mode of examination, and admission of evidence, and, generally, in other respects, as is prescribed for the claims there specified; and they shall decide them according to justice and equity.

The award of the commissioners, in such cases, or any board of them, as is provided in the second article, shall be final and conclusive, both as to the justice of the demand, and the amount of the sum to be paid to the creditors or claimants. And, when in favor of claimants, they shall comprehend interest from the times, respectively, at which the debts ought, according to the tenor or nature of the contract, to have been paid, at the rates respectively stipulated therein; or, where none was specially stipulated, at such rate, in each case, as the commissioners shall judge to be just. But it is understood that no person, by omitting to prefer such, his claim, to the said commissioners, shall thereby impair his right to seek and obtain payment by any other means.

Whatever sum shall be awarded in favor of any claimant under this article, the Government of the French republic will, in three months after the date of the award, on condition of such releases or assignments to be given by him as the said commissioners may direct, cause to be paid to him, without deduction, in gold or silver coin, at Paris, or will then convert the same into transferable stock or capital, bearing an interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum; which interest and principal the said Government will cause to be paid, without deduction, in gold or silver coin, to such claimant, or his transferee at Paris, viz. the interest annually, and the principal by three equal instalments, viz. one-third in two years, one-third in four years, and the remaining third in six years from the date of the award. The form of the security or securities and the mode of transfer to be such as the said commissioners shall prescribe.

ART. 6. It is further agreed that the commissioners mentioned in this and the preceding articles shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two nations; such agreement being to be settled at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty. And all other expenses attending the said commissioners shall be defrayed jointly by the two parties; the same being previously ascertained and allowed by a majority of the commissioners. And in case of death, sickness, or necessary absence, the place of every such commissioner, respectively, shall be supplied in the same manner as such commissioner was first appointed; and the new commissioner shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties.

Explanatory Note.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic will please to observe that a blank is left for the insertion of such claims of the citizens of the republic on the United States as the ministers may think proper to bring forward. A blank is also left for the mode of selecting the five proposed commissioners, and another for the manner in which they shall be organized; for the filling of which two last the envoys of the United States are preparing propositions, which will be sent in a day or two. A blank is also left for the title of the treaty, of which the proposed articles, if agreed to, may form a part.

APRIL 18.

The views of the French Government being in some measure developed in the preceding correspondence, and the negotiation having now assumed some form, it was thought proper to advise the Government of the United States of the progress and state of the business. The following letter was therefore written to the Secretary of State; duplicates and triplicates were also afterwards forwarded.

SIR: PARIS, April 18, 1800.

Your despatches of the 6th and 20th of January reached us some time since, as did also their duplicates and triplicates.

We all met here the 2d of March, Mr. Murray having arrived the evening before. The papers marked from A to V, which we have the honor to enclose, trace the circumstances connected with our mission, which have since taken place.

On the 5th of March, we waited on the Minister of Exterior Relations, delivered copies of our letters of credence, and requested to be informed at what time we should have an audience of the Premier Consul. He observed that, in cases like ours, it was usual to postpone the audience till the negotiation was finished. We replied that, should we be honored with one before the negotiation commenced, we thought its effects would be favorable. Mr. Talleyrand then said that he supposed there would be no difficulty on that point, and that he would speak to the Premier Consul about it.

On the 8th of March, agreeably to the notification which we had in the meantime received, we attended, and had an audience of the Premier Consul at the palace of the Tuileries, and delivered him our letters of credence. We were received with the respect due to the character which we had the honor to bear. The audience was a public one, and was attended by the two other consuls, the Ministers of the Government, members of the council of state, general officers, and the ministers of foreign Powers. After the compliments usual on such occasions had passed, Mr. Talleyrand informed us that a commission of three ministers plenipotentiary had been appointed to negotiate with us, and that we should receive a note from him officially notifying us of that appointment; which we accordingly received in the evening of the same day.

The illness of Mr. Joseph Bonaparte, president of the French commission, prevented our meeting with them for the exchange of powers till the 2d instant; and the time till the 7th was also lost in obtaining such further powers, as were satisfactory to us. Since that day, you will perceive that the negotiation has made some progress; and will doubtless also perceive, that there has been, on our part, due solicitude to give it facility.

Our note of yesterday, sent to day, was accompanied with six articles covering the whole ground of individual claims, and formed for a treaty; but there has not been time to prepare a copy for this despatch. It is understood that the campaign has opened between Austria and France, on the side of Italy.

We have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your obedient humble servants,

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

P. S. We shall be hard pressed to revive the old treaty, so far, at least, as to save its anteriority.

APRIL 21.

The envoys being extremely desirous of forming the Board of Commissioners for adjusting the claims in some manner that might avoid the inconveniences which have resulted from the mode prescribed in the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain, had retained that part of the subject under consideration till the 21st of April; when, after the discussion of several projects, they finally agreed that, under all circumstances, the mode adopted in the above treaty was the least exceptionable, and transmitted the following note to the French ministers:

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French Republic.

CITIZENS MINISTERS: PARIS, April 21, 1800.

The undersigned requests that the blanks in the articles which they had the honor to send you under the date of the 17th May, be filled as follows, viz: that left for the mode of selecting the five commissioners with these words: "Two of them shall be appointed by the Premier Consul of the French republic, two of them by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the fifth by the unanimous voice of the other four; and, in case they should not agree in such choice, the commissioners named by the two parties shall respectively propose one person; and of the names so proposed, one shall be drawn by lot in the presence of the four original commissioners." That left for the organization of a board, with these words: "Three of said commissioners shall constitute a board, and shall have power to do any act pertaining to said commission, provided that one of the commissioners on each side, and the fifth commissioner, shall be present."

And that the sentence which contains a blank for the place of their meeting, may be so completed as to read thus: "The commissioners shall be appointed, and meet at Paris, within six months from the ratification of this treaty by the respective Governments, and as much sooner as may be; but they shall have power to adjourn from place to place as they shall see cause."

MAY 6, 1800.

The following note was received to-day from the French ministers:

PARIS, le 16 Floreal, an 8.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française regardent ainsi que Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires et ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis la communication de leur projet de traité comme une manière franche d'amener la discussion des principes qui doivent eclairer la négociation et d'en rappeller le but.

Le but de cette négociation est d'operer le rapprochement et de cimenter l'ancienne amitié des deux nations.

Les principes d'où les soussignés croient nécessaire départir sont ceux qui peuvent déterminer le véritable sens des obligations mutuelles, dont l'inexécution, réelle ou présumée, a causée la mésintelligence des Gouvernemens respectifs.

La liquidation et l'acquittement des dommages qui ont pu resulter pour les deux nations ou leurs citoyens de cette mésintelligence passagère ne peuvent être considérées que comme une suite de l'interprétation qui sera donnée d'une commune accord aux traités, et comme le gage d'un retour sincère aux rélations primitives des deux nations, et de l'oubli des evènemens qui les ont troublées.

La communication du projet proposé par Messieurs les ministres des Etats Unis tend, donc, à l'applanissement des difficultés qui peuvent se rencontrer entre le but où il se convient d'arriver, et des principes d'où il convient départir.

Il n'y a point de doute sur le but où tendent les vœus et les intérêts communs.

Les ministres respectifs sont d'accord aussi sur la convenance d'une compensation.

La discussion se borne donc maintenant a deux points, savoir: 1. Quels sont les principes qui ont du et doivent gouverner les relations politiques et commerciales des deux nations? 2. Quelle est la manière la plus convenable aux intérêts respectifs de liquider, et solder les indemnités qui pourront être dues.

L'éxamen des principes paroit devoir préceder celui des moyens d'indemnité, puisque d'une part l'indemnité ne peut résulter que d'une contravention avouée, d'une obligation reconnue; et que de l'autre c'est l'accord sur les principes qui peut seul assurer la paix et entretenir l'amitié.

En conséquence, les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française s'empresseraient en ce moment de s'expliquer sur les divers interpretations données respectivement aux traités depuis plusieurs années, si à la lecture de l'article 2 du projet de traité qui leur a été communiqué, ils n'auraient été frappé d'une interpretation, dont ils ne conçoivent ni la cause ni l'objet, et sur laquelle une explication leur a paru nécessaire. Les mots qui la renferment concernant les Arbitres qui seront nommés pour la liquidation des dommages; "ils decideront (porte le projet) les réclamations d'après leur mérite intrinsique et originale, conformément à la justice et au droit des gens, et dans toutes les causes des plaintes antérieures au 7 Juillet 1798, ils prononceront conformément aux traités, et à la convention consulaire alors existant entre la France et les Etats Unis.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ne connaissent aucun e raison qui autorise à distinguer entre le temps antérieur au 7 Juillet, 1798, et le temps postérieur, pour appliquer aux dommages qui ont eu lieu durant les premiers, les dispositions des traités, et seulement les principes du droit des gens à ceux qui ont eu lieu durant les autres.

La mission des ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française leur a indiqué les traités d'alliance, d'amitié, et de commerce, et la convention consulaire, comme les seules bases de leurs négociations. C'est sur ces actes qui s'est élevée la mésintelligence; c'est sur ces actes qui paroit devoir se retablir l'union et l'amitié.

Quand les soussignés se sont empressés à reconnaître le principe de la compensation c'a été pour donner un témoignage non équivoque de la fidélité du Gouvernement Français à ses anciens engagemens; toute stipulation pécuniaire lui paraissant convenable, comme la suite d'anciens traités, et non comme les préliminaires d'un nouveau.

Les soussignés prient, &c.

BONAPARTE,
FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

P. S. Nous avons l'honneur de vous adresser cy-joint des actes qui constatent l'empressement du Gouvernement pour faire cesser les causes d'irritation qui ont pu subsister quelquestems.

PARIS, 16*th Floreal*, (6*th May*) year 8.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic coincide with the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, in viewing the communication of their project of a treaty as a frank mode of leading to the discussion of principles, which should guide the negotiation and promote its object.

The object of the negotiation is to restore the harmony and cement the friendship formerly subsisting between the two nations.

The principles, with which the undersigned conceive it necessary to commence, are those which can determine the true sense of the mutual obligations, the real or supposed infraction of which has caused a misunderstanding between the respective Governments.

The liquidation and discharge of the damages which may have resulted, either to the two nations or to their citizens, from this momentary misunderstanding, can only be considered as a consequence of the interpretation which, by common consent, shall be given to ancient treaties, as a proof of a sincere return to the primitive relations of the two nations, and as a pledge for the oblivion of those events by which the former relations have been disturbed.

The communication of this project, by the ministers of the United States, has, therefore, a tendency to remove the obstacles which lie in the way between the object to which it is proposed to arrive and the principles with which it is proper to set out.

No doubt exists respecting the object to which the desires and interests of both nations are directed.

The ministers, respectively, are also agreed on the expediency of providing a suitable indemnity.

The discussion, then, is now restricted to two points, viz: 1st. What are the principles which ought to have governed, and which ought still to govern, the political and commercial relations of the two nations? 2d. What is the mode, the best adapted to their respective interests, by which the ascertained indemnities shall be liquidated and discharged?

The examination of the principles ought to precede the consideration of the mode of indemnification: since, on the one hand, an indemnity cannot result except from an admitted contravention of an acknowledged obligation; and, on the other, it is only an agreement founded upon principles that can ensure peace and maintain friendship.

The ministers of the French republic would, for this reason, have seized the present moment to develop their views respecting the various interpretations which, for years past, have been given to the treaties, if, upon reading the 2d article of the project, which has been submitted, they had not been struck with an interpretation of which they can conceive neither the cause nor the object, and which, therefore, seems to require explanation. The words which contain it relate to the arbitrators to be appointed for the liquidation of damages. "They shall decide (says the project) the claims in question, according to the original merits of the several cases, and according to justice, equity, and the law of nations; and, in all cases of complaint, existing prior to the 7th July, 1798, according to the treaties and consular convention then existing between France and the United States."

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic are not aware of any reason which can authorize a distinction between the time prior to the 7th of July, 1798, and the time subsequent to that date, in order to apply the stipulations of treaties to the damages which have arisen during the first period, and only the principles of the laws of nations to those which have occurred during the second.

The commission of the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic has designated the treaty of alliance, and of friendship and commerce, and the consular convention, as the sole basis of their negotiations. Upon these acts the misunderstanding has arisen; and upon these acts it seems proper that union and friendship should be re-established.

In hastening to recognize the principle of compensation, it was the intention of the undersigned to exhibit an unequivocal proof of the fidelity of France to her ancient engagements; all pecuniary stipulations appearing to her proper as results from ancient treaties, not as preliminaries to a new one.

The undersigned pray, &c.

BONAPARTE.
FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

P. S. We have the honor to transmit herewith the acts which show the earnestness with which the Government desires to remove the causes of irritation which have heretofore existed.

MAY 7.

A conference was held to-day for the purpose of agreeing upon the draught of an answer; and, as the French ministers had acceded to the general proposition of mutual compensation and indemnity, in their note of the 19th Germinal, (9th of April,) and had again recognized the principle in their note of the 16th Floreal, (6th of May,) connected with certain discussions, and the ulterior adjustment of the existing differences in a treaty, the envoys were of opinion that they would facilitate the arrangements as to the preliminary object, and avoid the waste of time, in the discussion of general abstract principles, by sending the entire project of a treaty which they had then prepared. By these means, they hoped to fix the attention of the French ministers to the real objects of difference, and press the business forward with a degree of certainty that would mark the progress of the negotiation; and, therefore, the next day, the 8th of May, forwarded the answer which follows, of that date, accompanied by the remaining part of their project of a treaty, from article 7 to article 36, inclusive.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZENS MINISTERS: PARIS, May 8, 1800.

The undersigned have been honored with your note of the 16th of Floreal. They readily assign the reason why it was proposed by them that the treaties and consular convention, made between France and the United States, should be the rule of decision on the claims of their respective citizens, only with respect to causes of complaint which arose prior to the 7th July, 1798, leaving their subsequent causes of complaint to rest upon the law of nations; and also the reason why they cannot regard those treaties as the basis of the present negotiation for any other purpose than that of giving a rule by which causes of complaint, prior to the period above mentioned, are to be tested.

It was not till after the treaty of amity and commerce, of February, 1778, had been violated to a great extent on the part of the French republic, nor till after explanations and an amicable adjustment, sought by the United States, had been refused, that they did, on the 7th day of July, 1798, by a solemn public act, declare that they were freed and exonerated from the treaties and consular convention which had been entered into between them and France. Nor would such declaration, though justified by the law of nature and of nations, have even then been made, if it had been possible for the United States, while continuing the treaties and consular convention as the rule of their conduct, to guard against injuries which daily increased, and threatened their commerce with total destruction. That declaration cannot be recalled; and the United States must abide by its effects, with respect to the priority of treaties, whatever inconveniences may result to themselves. Their Government, it was understood, could not, with good faith, give to the undersigned powers to change or effect such priorities, and they do not possess them.

The undersigned deem it unnecessary, at present, to enumerate the acts of the French Government which produced the above measure. The principles of those decrees are as well understood, and now as fully acknowledged, as the mischiefs they have generated: and, as the object of this negotiation is to produce the reconciliation, and to cement the ancient friendship of the two nations, such a painful recapitulation would, at this time, answer no valuable purpose. They are, therefore, still of opinion that the views of the respective ministers should be directed to the object of terminating their differences in such a manner as, without a specific and detailed discussion on the merits of the respective complaints, might, by the adoption of plain and acknowledged principles of justice, produce mutual satisfaction and a permanent good understanding.

The undersigned recognize the principle that a right to indemnification can result only from the violation of a known obligation; and they conceive it to be equally incontrovertible that the law of nations constitutes such an obligation where treaties do not exist. They have not understood that the principle of compensation, proposed by them, was admitted without a supposition that the other points would be satisfactorily arranged: yet they trust that satisfying the demands of justice will always be considered as the wisest of political expedients.

The questions what are to be the political, and what the commercial relations of the two countries, have had the consideration, so far as the undersigned have been able to bestow it, which questions of such high and extensive import deserve.

For an answer to the first, they refer to their project of a treaty; and it is scarcely necessary to add that the interest of the United States, while it prompts them strongly to cultivate a good understanding with France, forbids them to wish such relations to any Power as might involve them in the contests with which Europe is so often scourged. They wish not even to afford in their ports, beyond the rights of hospitality, an asylum for privateers, which obstructs their commerce, and too easily entangles them in the conflicting passions and interests of the belligerent Powers.

It is true, however, that the engagements of the United States do not, as yet, permit them to pursue their policy, with respect to privateers, to its full extent. Those of one nation have a right of asylum in their ports, but it is a right which may cease in two years after the present war with Great Britain. Nor is it conceived to be very interesting to the French republic during the present war, which is presumed to draw near to an honorable termination, to whose prizes and privateers the ports of the United States may, in the meantime, be most open, as few or none of her merchantmen now pass that coast to be exposed, and as few or none of her enemies pass it without convoys too strong for privateers.

For an answer to the other question, what is to be the commercial relation of the two nations, the undersigned refer particularly to the thirteenth article of their project, which they have endeavored to accommodate, not only to the existing circumstances, but to the future hopes of both nations.

It is seen that this article goes further than the colonial and monopolizing systems of Europe have admitted an experiment of; but it is hoped that the period approaches when nations will cease to interpose those barriers and restraints upon commerce, which, besides checking industry and enterprise, diminish the value of every thing they have to sell, and enhance the price of every thing they purchase.

As to an unembarrassed intercourse between the United States and the French West India islands, in particular, nothing could more happily, or perhaps more justly, efface from the recollection of the former their sufferings in that quarter; and, certainly, nothing would sooner restore the latter to productiveness and utility. They need only, in addition, to order, facility of supplies and sales for a few years for their complete re-establishment, and even to carry them to a height of prosperity which the neighboring islands could not rival.

Reserving to the republic, exclusively, her coasting trade, and the direct trade between France and her colonies, and to the United States their coasting trade, and leaving each nation to encourage also, by a reduction of duties to a limited extent, the use of their own ships, is presumed sufficient so to raise the marines of both, (which, fortunately, can rise without being objects of mutual jealousy,) as to ensure a reasonable share of the privileges of the ocean.

And, lastly, it will not be an objection to this article, that, while it proposes to invigorate the commerce of France, it promises also extension and activity to that of the United States: because, it is well understood, that every depression which the commerce of the latter feels, and every risk to which it is subjected, profit only the enemies of the former, by augmenting their carrying trade, and increasing their naval power.

With this note, the undersigned have the honor to transmit the remaining part of a project, which, together with what has been transmitted, discloses fully their views, and will, as they hope, facilitate the progress of the negotiation. Accept, &c.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

P. S. The envoys of the United States have not had the pleasure to receive the copies referred to in the postscript of the note to which the above is an answer.

ART. 7. All citizens and inhabitants of either nation, detained within the jurisdiction of the other, for any cause, except for debt or crimes committed within the same, shall be immediately set at liberty. All ships of war, or other public ships, which either nation has taken from the other, and detains, shall be given up; or where that cannot, without difficulty, be done, the full value of them shall be restored; and the value, if not agreed between the parties, shall be ascertained by the commissioners mentioned in the second article.

And it is further agreed that, if the armed ships of the United States have retaken and set free from the ships of war or other public ships of the French republic, any prizes which they had captured from her enemies, the United States will make compensation to the French republic for the prizes so liberated. Claims for the same may be preferred to the said commissioners, who shall decide them according to justice and equity, and any sum or sums which they may award in satisfaction of such claims, the Government of the United States will cause to be paid, or secured in the same manner as is provided in the second article in the case of claims of the citizens of the French republic. And, as well all cases of either of the descriptions aforesaid which shall exist at the time of exchanging the ratifications of this treaty, as those which now exist, shall be considered within the intent and meaning of this article.

ART. 8. The citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall be exempted in the French republic from the droit d'aubaine, or other similar duty, under whatever name: and the citizens and inhabitants of both nations, may, by testament, donation, or otherwise, dispose of their real estates already acquired, and of their goods and effects; and their heirs or representatives, being citizens of one of the parties, and residing in either nation, or elsewhere, may succeed to them, even ab intestato, without being obliged to obtain letters of naturalization, and without having the effect of this provision contested or impeded under any pretext whatever: and their heirs or representatives shall receive such estate or goods and effects, either in person, or by attorney or substitute; and if the heirs or representatives, to whom such succession or devise and goods and effects may have fallen, shall be minors, the guardian, tutor, curator, or executor established by the testament or by the domiciliary laws of the country, whereof such minor shall be a citizen or inhabitant, may direct, administer, and alienate the estate or goods so fallen to such minors; and, in general, in relation to such estate and goods, use all the rights and fulfil all the functions, which belong by the disposition of the laws to such guardian, tutor, curator, or executor. The inheritances, as well as the goods and effects which the said citizens or inhabitants, in changing their abode, shall be desirous of removing from the place of their abode, shall be exempted, with respect to each, from all duty whatever. But it is at the same time agreed, that this article shall in no manner derogate from the laws which either State may have now in force, or may hereafter enact, to prevent emigration. Provided, also, that if the laws of either country should at any time be incompatible with the inheritance or devise of real estate by and to aliens, it is agreed that such real estate may be sold, or otherwise disposed of, to citizens or inhabitants of the country where it may be.

ART. 9. Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war, or national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

ART. 10. And whereas, debtors may flee from the territories of one of the contracting parties to those of the other, it is agreed that the creditors, being citizens or inhabitants of either nation, may pursue such debtors, whether they be citizens or inhabitants, or not, of either country, and shall have the benefit of the laws of the country to which such debtors may flee, on the one side and on the other in the same manner as if the debt or cause of action had arisen or been therein contracted.

ART. 11. And it is further agreed that the Governments of both nations, on requisitions by them respectively made, or by their respective ministers, consuls, or other officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons, who, being charged with murder or forgery committed within the territories of the party making the requisition, shall seek an asylum within any of the territories or dependencies of the other: provided, that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality, as, according to the laws of the nation where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed: the expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the arrested fugitive.

ART. 12. To favor commerce on both sides, it is agreed that, in case a war should break out between the two nations, (which God forbid!) the term of six months, after the declaration of war, shall be allowed to the merchants and other citizens and inhabitants, respectively, on one side and the other, in order that they may withdraw with their effects and moveables, which they shall be at liberty to send, carry away, or sell, where they please, without the least obstruction; nor shall their effects, much less their persons, be seized during such term of six months; on the contrary, passports, which shall be valid for a time necessary for their return, shall be given to them for their vessels and the effects which they shall be willing to send away or carry with them; and such passports shall be a safe conduct against all insults and prizes, which privateers may attempt against their persons or effects. And if any thing be taken from them, or any injury done to them or their effects, by one of the parties, their citizens, or inhabitants, within the time above prescribed, full satisfaction shall be made to them on that account.

ART. 13. And for the purpose of more effectually maintaining a good correspondence, and facilitating commerce between the citizens of the two nations, it is agreed, on the part of the United States, that the merchant ships and vessels of the French republic may freely enter, lade and unlade, at such convenient port or ports in each of the United States, situate on the ocean, as shall for that purpose be designated by the laws of the United States, and until such designation shall be made, at any of the ports of the same where foreign ships and vessels are now permitted to enter; and may, at all times, enter, lade, and unlade at any port in the said States, at which ships and vessels of the most favored nation shall be permitted to do the same.

The citizens of the French republic may import in such ships and vessels, and freely dispose of all merchandises, without exception, of the manufacture, growth, or produce of any part of the territories or dominions of the French republic, or of the produce of her fisheries, and also all merchandises of the manufacture, growth, or produce of any foreign country or place, the importation of which shall not be prohibited in ships and vessels of the United States; and they may export in such ships and vessels to any country or place out of the United States, all merchandises, the exportation of which shall not be prohibited in ships and vessels of the United States. There shall be paid on such ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, no other or higher duty than shall be paid on the ships and vessels of the most favored nation, nor any other or higher duty than a tonnage duty, not exceeding fifty cents per ton of the ship or vessel; and such duties or fees, on papers obtained from any office of the port, as the citizens of the United States shall pay in like cases.

No duties shall be paid on the exportation in such ships and vessels of any merchandise whatever; nor shall any other or higher duty be paid on the importation in such ships and vessels, of any merchandise, than the most favored nation shall pay in like cases; nor any other or higher duty than shall be paid on the importation of like merchandise in the ships and vessels of the United States; except that there may be exacted a duty less, by any proportion not exceeding one-eleventh part, on importations in their own ships and vessels than on importations in any other ships or vessels whatever; and except, also, that there may be exacted such duties on teas imported in the ships and vessels of the French republic, as shall be paid on teas imported in the ships and vessels of the most favored nation.

The ships and vessels of the French republic shall be permitted, when it shall be convenient for them, both to lade and unlade by parcels, at different ports in the United States, conforming to such regulations as the laws of the country shall prescribe, to prevent frauds in the revenue. But they shall not unlade in any port of the United States, what they have laded in any other port of the same, except in cases of distress, and shall then only be permitted to sell so much of what they so laded, as may be necessary for the repairs of the ship or vessel, and the prosecution of the voyage.

And it is also agreed, on the part of the French republic, that the merchant ships and vessels of the United States may freely enter, lade and unlade at such convenient port or ports in every part of the territories or dominions of the French republic in any quarter of the world, as shall, for that purpose, be designated by the laws of the republic; and until such designation shall be made at all the ports in the said territories or dominions where the ships or vessels of the French republic are now permitted to enter from the sea; and they may at all times enter, lade, and unlade at any ports within the said territories or dominions, at which ships or vessels of the most favored nation shall be permitted to do the same.

The citizens of the United States may import, in such ships or vessels, to every part of the said territories or dominions, and freely dispose of all merchandises, without exception, of the manufacture, growth, or produce of the United States, and of the produce of their fisheries; and also all merchandises of the manufacture, growth, or produce of any foreign country or place, the importation of which shall not be prohibited in ships and vessels of the French republic. And they may export in such ships and vessels, from every part of the said territories or dominions, to any country or place out of the same, all merchandises whatever, the exportation of which shall not be prohibited in ships and vessels of the said republic.

There shall not be paid on such ships and vessels, in any port in the territories or dominions of the French republic, any other or higher duty than shall be paid at such port on the ships and vessels of the most favored nation; nor any other or higher duty than a tonnage duty of fifty-three sols per ton of the ship or vessel, and such duty or fees on papers obtained from any office of the port as the citizens of the French republic shall pay in like cases.

No duties shall be paid on the exportation in such ships and vessels from any port in the said territories or dominions, of any merchandise whatever; nor shall any other or higher duty be paid on the importation in such ships and vessels, to any part of the said territories or dominions, of any merchandise whatever, than the most favored nation shall pay in like cases; nor any other or higher duty than shall be paid on the importation of like merchandises in ships and vessels of the French republic, except that there may be exacted a duty less, by any proportion not exceeding one-eleventh part, on importations in ships and vessels of the said republic, than on importations in any other ships and vessels whatever; and except, also, that there may be exacted such duties on teas imported in ships and vessels of the United States as shall be paid on teas imported in the ships and vessels of the most favored nation.

The ships and vessels of the United States shall be permitted, when it shall be convenient for them, both to lade and unlade, by parcels, in different ports throughout the territories or dominions of the French republic, conforming to such regulations as the laws of the country shall prescribe to prevent frauds in the revenue; but they shall not unlade in any port within the said territories or dominions what they have laded at any other port within the same, except in cases of distress; and shall then only be permitted to sell so much of what they had so laded as may be necessary for the repairs of the ship or vessel, and for the prosecution of the voyage.

ART. 14. The citizens of each party, respectively, shall have free admission into the dominions of the other, with liberty to reside there, to hire houses and warehouses, for the purposes of trade and commerce; and complete protection and security for the merchants and traders, citizens of either party, with their goods and effects, whether in going to, residing in, or retiring from the dominions, or from one part thereof to another of the other, shall be given. It shall be lawful for them, on either side, to employ such advocates, attorneys, notaries, solicitors, factors, brokers, and interpreters, without being obliged to employ either, as they shall think proper; and it shall be wholly free for all merchants, commanders of ships and vessels, citizens of either party, in every place subject to the jurisdiction of the other, to direct and manage their own affairs and business; and, in relation to the loading or unloading of their vessels, and every thing which has relation thereto, they shall not be obliged, though they may, if they please, to employ any persons but those of the crew of the vessel.

ART. 15. The ships of the citizens of the respective countries coming upon any of the coasts belonging to either of the parties, but not willing to enter into port, or, being entered into port, and not willing to unlade their cargoes or break bulk, shall not be obliged to give an account of their lading, unless they are suspected, upon sure evidence, of carrying prohibited goods, called contraband, to the enemies of either of the two contracting parties; but shall be subject, nevertheless, to such regulations in the port as may be prescribed by the government of the place.

ART. 16. In case the citizens of either party, with their shipping, whether they be public, and equipped for war, or private, and employed in commerce, be forced, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, or any other urgent necessity for seeking of shelter and harbor, to retract and enter into any of the rivers, creeks, bays, ports, roads, or shores belonging to the other party, they shall be received with all humanity and kindness, and enjoy all friendly protection and help; and they shall be permitted to refresh and provide themselves, at reasonable rates, with victuals, and all things needful for the sustenance of their persons, or reparation of their ships; and they shall be allowed to break bulk, and unlade and sell, conformably to the orders and regulations of the government of the place, so much of the cargo as may be necessary to defray their expenses, without being obliged to pay any duties whatever, except only on such articles as they may be permitted to sell for the purposes aforesaid; and they shall no ways be detained or hindered from returning out of the said ports or roads, but may remove and depart when and whither they please, without any let or hindrance.

ART. 17. If any ship belonging to either of the parties, or their citizens, shall be wrecked, foundered, or otherwise damaged, the same protection and assistance shall be given to the persons shipwrecked, or such as shall be in danger thereof, or be otherwise distressed, as would be afforded in like cases to the inhabitants of the country on whose coasts such misfortune may happen; and letters of safe conduct shall likewise be given to them, when required, for their free and quiet passage from thence, and their return to their own country.

ART. 18. It is likewise agreed that deserters from the public and private vessels of either nation shall be arrested and delivered up, on application made, according to the orders and regulations of the government of the place where such deserters shall be, by the consul, vice consul, or agent of the nation of which such deserter may be a citizen; and suitable provisions shall be made by law, in each country, for that purpose; and not only the original enlistment, shipping paper, or rôle d'équipage, but a copy or extract, certified to be conformable to the original, by a judge of the country in which the vessel may be, or from which she may have departed, shall also be admitted in proof of desertion; and such extract or copy shall have in all the ports of the respective Powers the same force with the original, for six months: And it is further agreed that the masters and commanders of vessels, public and private, of one nation, in the country of the other, may engage and receive on board seamen and others, natives or inhabitants of the country to which the vessels belong: Provided, That, either on one side or the other, they shall not be at liberty to take into their service such of their countrymen (deserters excepted) as may have already engaged in the service of the other party, whether they meet them by land or by sea, unless the captains or masters under whose command such persons may be found will voluntarily discharge them from their service.

ART. 19. Neither of the said parties shall permit the ships or goods belonging to the citizens of the other to be taken within cannon shot of the coast, nor in any of the bays, ports, or rivers of their territories, by ships of war, or others having commissions from any foreign state or Prince; but, in case it should so happen, the party whose territorial rights shall thus have been violated, shall use his utmost endeavors to obtain from the offending party full and ample satisfaction for the goods and vessel or vessels so taken, whether the same be vessels of war or merchant vessels.

ART. 20. It shall be lawful for the citizens of either country to sail with their ships and merchandise (contraband goods always excepted) from any port whatever, to any port of the enemy of the other, and to sail and trade with their ships and merchandise with perfect security and liberty, from the countries, ports, and places of those who are enemies of both, or of either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever; and to pass, not only directly from the places and ports of the enemy aforementioned, to neutral ports and places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same Power, or under several; unless such ports or places shall be actually blockaded, besieged, or invested.

And whereas, it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or place belonging to an enemy, without knowing that the same is either besieged, blockaded, or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place, but she shall not be detained, nor any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated, unless after notice she shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she may think proper; nor shall any vessel of either, that may have entered into such port or place, before the same was actually besieged, blockaded, or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her return cargo; nor, if found therein after the reduction or surrender of such place, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners or proprietors thereof.

Art. 21. In order to regulate what is in future to be esteemed contraband of war, it is agreed that, under the said denomination, shall be comprised gunpowder, saltpetre, petards, match, ball, bombs, grenades, carcasses, cartridge-boxes, pikes, halberds, swords, belts, pistols, holsters, cavalry saddles and furniture, cannon, mortars, their carriages and beds, and, generally, all kinds of arms and instruments fit for the use of troops. All the above articles, whenever they are destined to the port of an enemy, are hereby declared to be contraband, and just objects of confiscation; but the vessel in which they are laden, and the residue of the cargo, shall be considered free, and not in any manner infected by the prohibited goods, whether belonging to the same or a different owner.

Art. 22. It is agreed that in all cases where vessels shall be captured or detained on just suspicion of having on board enemy's property, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war, the said vessel shall be brought to the nearest or most convenient port of the country to which the captor belongs; and if any property of an enemy should be found on board such vessel, that part only which belongs to the enemy, or which consists of articles contraband of war, destined as aforesaid, shall be made prize, and the vessel shall be at liberty to proceed with the remainder, without any impediment; and a reasonable freight shall be paid by the captor on such property of the enemy as shall be made prize. And it is agreed that all proper measures shall be taken to prevent delay in deciding the cases of ships or cargoes so brought in for adjudication, and in the payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged or agreed to be paid to the masters or owners of such ship: Nevertheless, it is agreed that such effects and merchandises, even though the property of an enemy, as were put on board before the declaration of war, or —— months after it, shall not be in any manner subject to confiscation, but shall be faithfully and specifically restored to be carried to their place of destination: Provided, notwithstanding, That if such merchandise be contraband, destined as aforesaid, it shall not be in anywise lawful to carry them afterwards to a port belonging to an enemy; and, also, that if there shall be found on board the vessel of an enemy, captured by either party or its citizens, any property of the other party, or of its citizens, the same shall not be confiscated, but freely restored to the owners or proprietors thereof.

Art. 23. And that captures on light suspicions may be avoided, and injuries thence arising prevented, it is agreed that, in case either of the parties should be engaged in a war, the ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the other shall be furnished with sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of the said ship, that it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties; which sea-letter or passport shall be made out and granted according to the form annexed to this treaty; they shall likewise be renewed every year, that is, if the vessel should return home within the space of a year. It is likewise agreed that such ships, being laden, are to be provided not only with passports, as above mentioned, but also with certificates containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place from whence the vessel sailed, and whither she is bound, that so it may be known whether she carries any of the contraband goods specified in the twenty-first article of this treaty; which certificates shall be made out in the accustomed form of the country from whence the vessel sailed; and neither party shall require the exhibition of any papers or documents (the sea-letter and certificates aforementioned excepted) not required by the laws or usages of the party to whose citizens the vessels and their cargoes belong, nor in any other form than the laws and usages of such last mentioned party shall prescribe. And it is expressly stipulated and agreed, that, when the quality of the ship, goods, and master sufficiently appear from the passport and certificates aforesaid, it shall not be lawful for the commanders of armed vessels to exact any further proof, under any pretext whatever; and that when any merchant ship shall not be provided with such passport and certificates, such case may be examined by a proper judge or tribunal; and if it shall be found from other documents or proofs that the vessel truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties, it shall not be confiscated, but shall be released with its cargo, (enemy's property and contraband goods, as aforesaid, excepted) and be permitted to proceed on its voyage.

If the master of the ship named in the passport should happen to die, or be removed by any other cause, and another put in his place, the ship and goods laden thereon shall, nevertheless, be equally secure, and the passport remain in full force.

Art. 24. If the ships of the citizens of either of the parties shall be met with, either sailing along the coasts or on the high seas, by any ships of war, or by any privateers of the other, for the avoiding of any disorder, the said ships of war or privateers shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send their boats on board the merchant ship which they shall so meet with, and may enter her to the number of two or three men only, to whom the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall exhibit his passport concerning the property of the ship, made out according to the form annexed to this present treaty, and also the certificates aforesaid relative to the cargo; and, when the master or commander shall have exhibited such passport and certificates, and there shall not appear among the articles of the said cargo enemy's property, or any articles contraband of war, then such master or commander shall be at liberty to pursue his voyage, so as it shall not be lawful to molest or search his vessel in any manner, or to give her chase, or force her to quit her intended course: And it is expressly agreed that the neutral party shall in no case be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting his papers, or for any other examination whatever.

Art. 25. It is agreed that, in all cases where vessels shall be captured, or detained by reason of their having on board enemy's property, or carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war, the captor shall give a receipt for such of the papers of the vessel as he shall retain; which receipt shall be annexed to a descriptive list of the said papers, and the said vessel shall be brought to the nearest and most convenient port of the country to which the captor belongs; and it shall be unlawful to break up or open the hatches, chests, trunks, casks, bales, or vessels found on board such ship, or to remove even the smallest parcel of the goods, unless the lading be brought on shore in the presence of the officers of the Admiralty, and an inventory made by them of the said goods; nor shall it be lawful to sell, exchange, or alienate the same in any manner, unless, after due and lawful process shall have been had against such goods, and the Judge or Judges of the Admiralty, respectively, shall, by sentence pronounced, have confiscated the same, saving, always, as well the ship itself as the other goods found therein; and if, when only part of the cargo shall consist of contraband goods, the master of the ship shall agree, consent, and offer to deliver them to the captor who has discovered them, in such case the captor, having received those goods as lawful prize, shall forthwith release the ship, and not hinder her by any means from prosecuting her voyage to the place of her destination.

Art. 26. And that proper care may be taken of the vessel and cargo, and embezzlement prevented, it is agreed that it shall not be lawful to remove the master or commander of any captured vessel, or the supercargo thereof, from on board the same, neither during the time that the vessel may be at sea after her capture, nor pending the proceedings against her or her cargo, or any part thereof. And in all cases where a vessel of the citizens of either party shall be captured or seized, and held for adjudication, her officers, passengers, and crew shall be hospitably treated. They shall not be imprisoned, nor deprived of any part of their wearing apparel, nor of the possession and use of their money, not exceeding, for the captain, supercargo, and mate, five hundred dollars each; and, for the sailors and passengers, one hundred dollars each.

ART. 27. If it shall appear that the captor bribed, or attempted to bribe, any of the ship's crew or passengers to give any evidence, or make any declaration or disclosure whatever respecting the vessel, her lading, or destination, or make use of any kind of torture upon the master of the ship, the crew, or others who shall be on board the same, in such case, whatever grounds there might otherwise be for condemnation, the ship and her lading shall, without delay, be acquitted and restored, with costs and damages; and, also, such as shall be guilty of any of the said crimes, as well as their accomplices, shall suffer the most severe punishment suitable to their offences. And, to ensure the observance of this article, provision shall be made by law in each country to carry the same into full effect.

ART. 28. It is further agreed that all prizes shall be conducted to a port of the party at war; and, in all cases, the established courts for prize causes, in the country to which the prizes may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance of them. And whenever such tribunal or court of either of the parties shall pronounce sentence against any vessel, or goods, or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the reasons or motives of such judgment shall be entered in the sentence or decree, and a duly authenticated copy of all the proceedings in the cause, and of the said sentence, shall, if required, be delivered to the commander or agent of the said vessel without the smallest delay, he paying all legal fees and demands for the same.

ART. 29. When process shall be moved, in the first or second instance, between those that have taken the prizes at sea and the persons interested therein, and the said interested persons shall come to obtain a favorable judgment or decree, the said judgment or decree shall have its execution, upon security given, notwithstanding the appeal of him that took the prize: but the same shall not hold, on the contrary, where the sentence goes against the claimers.

ART. 30. The merchant ships belonging to the citizens of either of the two contracting parties, which intend to go to a port at enmity with the other, concerning whose voyage and the sort of goods on board there may be just cause of suspicion, shall be obliged to exhibit, as well on the high seas as in the ports and havens, not only their passports, but also their certificates expressing that the goods are not of the kind which are contraband, as specified in the twenty-first article of this treaty.

ART. 31. And that more abundant care may be taken for the security of the respective citizens of the contracting parties, and to prevent their suffering injuries by the men of war or privateers of either party, all commanders of ships of war and privateers, and all others the said citizens, shall forbear doing any damage to those of the other party, or committing any outrage against them; and, if they act to the contrary, they shall be punished, and shall also be bound in their persons and estates to make satisfaction and reparation for all damages, and the interest thereof, of whatever nature the said damages may be.

For this cause all commanders of privateers, before they receive their commissions, shall hereafter be obliged to give, before a competent judge, sufficient security, by at least two responsible sureties who have no interest in the said privateer; each of whom, together with the said commander, shall be jointly and severally bound in the sum of ——— dollars or ——— francs; or, if such ship be provided with above one hundred and fifty seamen or soldiers, in the sum of ——— dollars or ——— francs, to satisfy all damages and injuries which the said privateer, or her officers or men, or any of them, may do or commit, during their cruise, contrary to the tenor of this treaty, or to the laws and instructions for regulating their conduct: and further, that in all cases of aggressions, the said commissions shall be revoked and annulled.

ART. 32. It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers, who have commissions from any other Prince or state in enmity with either nation, to arm their ships in the ports of either of the said parties, nor to sell what they have taken, nor in any other manner to exchange the same, nor shall they be allowed to purchase more provisions than shall be necessary for their going to the nearest port of that Prince or state from whom they obtained their commissions.

ART. 33. It is further agreed that both the said contracting parties shall not only refuse to receive any pirates into any of their ports, havens, or towns, or permit any of their inhabitants to receive, protect, harbor, conceal, or assist them in any manner, but will bring to condign punishment all such inhabitants as shall be guilty of such acts or offences. And all their ships, with the goods or merchandises taken by them, and brought into the port of either of the said parties, shall be seized, as far as they can be discovered, and shall be restored to the owners, or their factors or agents duly deputed and authorized in writing by them, (proper evidence being first given in the Court of Admiralty for proving the property,) even in case such effects should have passed into other hands by sale, if it be proved that the buyers knew, or had good reason to believe or suspect, that they had been piratically taken.

ART. 34. Neither party will intermeddle in the fisheries on the coasts of the other, nor disturb the other in the exercise of the rights which it now holds or may acquire of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, in the gulf of St. Lawrence, or elsewhere on the American coast northward of the United States of America; but the whale and seal fisheries shall be free to both in every quarter of the world.

ART. 35. It shall be free for the two contracting parties, respectively, to appoint consuls for the protection of trade, to reside in the dominions and territories of each party. Either of the parties may except from the residence of consuls such particular places as such party shall judge proper to be excepted. Before any consul shall act as such, he shall be, in the usual forms, approved and admitted by the party to whose territory he is sent; and the said consuls shall enjoy those liberties and rights which belong to them by reason of their function. And it is agreed that the admission of a consul by the Government of a colony, shall be deemed such a provisional admission as to entitle him to act as such until the will of the Government to which such colony belongs shall be formally made known. And it is hereby declared to be lawful and proper, that, in case of illegal or improper conduct towards the laws or Government, a consul may be either punished according to law, or dismissed, and even sent back; the offended Government assigning to the other their reason for the same.

ART. 36. It is agreed that the first twelve articles of this treaty shall be permanent, and that the subsequent articles shall be limited to twelve years, to be computed from the day on which the ratifications of this treaty shall be exchanged.

Nothing in this treaty shall be construed to operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other Sovereigns or states.

MAY 16.

The following letter was received from the Secretary of State, and, on the next day, the letter under date of the 17th, was prepared, and forwarded with the several enclosures mentioned; duplicates and triplicates of this last despatch were also soon afterwards sent by different routes.

GENTLEMEN: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, February 14, 1800.

In your commissions containing your full powers, you are named "envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic;" and you are authorized "to meet and confer with the minister or ministers of the French republic, who shall be appointed and commissioned with equal powers, and with such minister or ministers to discuss and settle by a treaty all controversies between the United States and France." Consequently, the circumstance of your letters of credence being addressed to the late "Executive Directory," need not prevent or impede the proposed negotiation, provided the existing Government in France are inclined to enter upon it, and to conclude a treaty. This is the President's opinion, and, by his direction, I now communicate it to you. Indeed, the idea must have occurred to you, it being obvious that a satisfactory treaty, however negotiated, which shall be approved and ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, will be alike valid as if conducted with the most minute attention to customary formalities.

I am, with great respect, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH, WILLIAM R. DAVIE, WILLIAM V. MURRAY,
Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the French Republic.

PARIS, May 17, 1800.

SIR: We had the honor to write to you on the 18th ultimo, covering all the communications between us and the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic up to that date, and a duplicate and triplicate of that despatch have also been forwarded. The quadruplicate of your letter, (No. —,) arrived some time ago, and your letters of the 14th of February and 7th of March were received last evening.

The enclosed copies, marked W. X. will give you the necessary information respecting the progress and present state of the negotiation. As the French ministers entered on the business of their commission soon after their appointment, and at the seat of their Government, it seems to have been so arranged that they were to receive their instructions on important points as they might become necessary in the course of the negotiations. This duty was naturally attached to the office of Exterior Relations; and our progress has suffered some delay by the sickness of M. Talleyrand, who has been confined by a severe illness from about the 15th of April to the 14th or 15th of this month. You will observe, however, that, even during this period, the business has been pressed forward on our part the whole length of the proposed treaty, with a view of avoiding all useless discussion, of fixing the attention of the ministers to the real points of difference, and of marking with certainty the progress of the negotiation.

The situation of the army of Italy, commanded by General Massena, has been extremely critical, and has attracted the particular attention of the Premier Consul; and the army of reserve, amounting to about sixty thousand men, has marched to its relief. The French are, however, very successful on the Rhine, and the Government is as yet unshaken; it professes justice and moderation, and appears to be desirous of peace, which, there is some reason to believe, may be the result of the present campaign.

Our success is yet doubtful. The French think it hard to indemnify for violating engagements, unless they can thereby be restored to the benefits of them. Very few American vessels have been brought into European ports since our arrival at Paris, and, for some time past, we have heard of none. We know not, however, of any orders of this Government for the restraining of captures, except such as may have been the consequence of the enclosed law, repealing that of the 29th Nivose. Prisoners have been generally released, on a receipt being given by the American agents, promising the discharge of as many French seamen from confinement in the United States.

The court lately established for deciding questions of prize administratively, as it is called, and before which there are many American appeals, has not yet made any decisions.

We enclose, also, the copy of the law repealing the 1st article of the law of the 29th Nivose, and the arrêté of the consuls respecting their new court, called "le conseil des prises."

We have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servants,

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq., Secretary of State.

The following note was received, covering two acts of the French Government:

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république ont l'honneur d'adresser à Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis les pièces annoncées par le P. S. de leur dernière note, et qui ont été oubliées.

[TRANSLATION.]

The ministers plenipotentiary of the republic have the honor to transmit to the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States the documents announced in the postscript to their last note, which had been accidentally omitted.

They pray the ministers of the United States to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

The 26th FLOREAL, (16*th April.*)

PARIS, May 19, 1800.

The envoys extraordinary of the United States have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of two acts of the French Government, mentioned in the postscript of the note of the ministers of the republic. These papers have been forwarded to the Government of the United States, who, as late as the 7th of March, had received no advices respecting the acts or measures of the present Government of France.

They request the ministers of the republic to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

MAY 23.

The French ministers had frequently mentioned, in conversation, the insuperable repugnance of their Government to yield its claim to the anteriority assumed to it in the treaty of amity and commerce of 1778; urging the equivalent alleged to be accorded by France for this stipulation; the meritorious ground on which they generally represented the treaty stood; denying strenuously the power of the American Government to annul the treaties by a simple legislative act, and always concluding that it was perfectly incompatible with the honor and dignity of France to assent to the extinction of a right in favor of an enemy, and much more so to appear to acquiesce in the establishment of that right in favor of Great Britain. The priority with respect to the right of asylum for privateers and prizes, was the only point in the old treaty on which they had anxiously insisted, and which they agreed could not be as well provided for by a new stipulation. They had, however, transmitted no answer to the note of the envoys, covering the remaining part of the project of a treaty; and only indirect intimations had been received, that difficulties had arisen, from the limited nature of the instructions of the French ministers. But, at an interview to-day, the envoys were officially informed that the negotiation was at a stand on the part of France; that no further progress could be made until other powers* were procured from the Premier Consul, as the tenor of their instructions made the acknowledgment of former treaties the basis of negotiation and the condition of compensation; that the French commission was working upon a report which would be delivered in a day or two to the Minister of Exterior Relations, and forwarded immediately by a courier to the Premier Consul, who had left Paris the 6th of May, and was supposed to be at this time in Switzerland or Italy.

MAY 24.

The envoys held a conference to-day for the purpose of taking into consideration the information received yesterday, and the critical state of the negotiation; and, considering that the judgment of the Premier Consul would probably be formed upon the impressions made by the report; that the instructions which would be the result might possibly be conclusive; and that, in any event, there might be some difficulty, and certainly delay, in procuring any alteration, it was deemed expedient to transmit the note following, under date of the 25th, with a view to obviate any apprehension that our Government contemplated further grants to their prejudice, and as containing an intermediate ground, conciliatory to the pride of the French Government, without sacrificing the honor or interests of the United States.

PARIS, May 25, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned having bestowed the most mature consideration upon the subject so often mentioned with so much interest by the ministers of the French republic, and being desirous of guarding against any misapprehension on that head, have thought it expedient to propose the clause enclosed, as an addition to the thirty-second article of their project of a treaty.

Accept, citizen ministers, the assurance of their high consideration.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

To be added to the thirty-second article.

Nor will either of the said parties, while they continue in amity, make a treaty with any foreign Sovereign or state, stipulating for the privateers and prizes of such Sovereign or state an asylum in the ports of either, unless they shall have assured to each other such right of asylum for the privateers and prizes of each in the ports of the other.

MAY 26.

The following letter was received from the Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, April 9, 1800.

GENTLEMEN:

On the 3d instant Captain Barry arrived here with your letter, dated at Burgos, on the 10th of February, covering copies of your letters of December 7th from Lisbon, and January 17th from Corunna, and your correspondence with Mr. Talleyrand. These are the first and only despatches received from you since you left the United States. We are happy you escaped the perils of the sea in your attempting a voyage from Lisbon to L'Orient.

The answer of Mr. Talleyrand confirms the opinion expressed in your letter to him, that the circumstance of your letters of credence being addressed to the Directory of the French republic could be viewed merely as a formality of no moment to the object of your mission. Your powers are full to negotiate and settle by treaty all differences between the United States and the French republic, and to make commercial arrangements. The person or persons vested with the executive power of the nation, if really desirous of such an adjustment, could not possibly make any serious objection to the address of your letters of credence, which was perfectly correct at their date. For these reasons, and because no official notice has been received of any change in the form of the Government of France, or in the person administering it, the President does not think it necessary to send any new letters of credence. Mr. Talleyrand having said that "the form of your letters of credence would be no obstacle to the opening of negotiations, of which he ventured to foresee the happy success," must indeed be considered as removing all doubt on the subject.

The ship Portsmouth, Captain M'Neil, goes with this letter to Havre de Grace, whence he will send one of his officers to Paris, and receive your orders. The President supposes that by the time of her arrival, your negotiations will be concluded, and that Judge Ellsworth and Governor Davie will take their passage in her to America. Should your negotiations be still pending, and any reason satisfactory to yourselves, (according to the latitude given in your instructions,) determine you to wait longer in France, you will, at your discretion, either detain or send back the Portsmouth, as you shall think expedient for the public good.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH, WILLIAM R. DAVIE, WILLIAM V. MURRAY, Esquires, Envoys Extraordinary, &c. to the French republic.

JUNE 1.

As the French ministers had yet made no answer to the notes of the 8th and 25th of May, covering the remaining details of the project of a treaty, the American ministers thought it would be proper to press them for an answer, or at least an explanation on the cause of their silence; and sent them the following note, which was answered by the note under date of the 16th Prairial.

PARIS, 1*st June*, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

Solicitous as are the undersigned, citizen ministers, to terminate happily and with promptitude a negotiation which is calculated to promote the interests of the two nations, they invite your attention to their notes of the 8th and 25th of May, and hope to be honored with as early an answer as the state of the business will admit of.

They trust that, while they avow a strong disposition to hasten the great object in view, they will not be chargeable with impatience: the frank development of their views will have been properly estimated.

Accept, citizen ministers, the assurances of their high consideration.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

PARIS, le 16 Prairial, an 8.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française, soussignés, partagent tout l'empressement que Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires et envoyés extraordinaires des Etats Unis témoignent dans leur note du 12ème de ce mois, de voir terminer favorablement et promptement la négociation confiée à leurs soins respectifs. Les ministres Français, en accusant à Messieurs les ministres Américains la reception de leur note du 18ème Floreal dernier, ont eu l'honneur à leur annoncer que l'examen de son contenu pourrait entrainer quelque délai. Cette note a été l'objet de la plus sérieuse attention de leur part, et d'après une mûre délibération il leur a paru que les propositions qui s'y trouvent renfermées etoient de nature à être soumise à la décision du Gouvernement de la république. Les ministres plénipotentiaires ont, en conséquence, transmis cette note au Ministre des Relations Extérieures; ce ministre informe qu'il a du lui-même prendre les ordres du Premier Consul de la république. Aussitôt que les soussignés auront reçu les instructions qu'ils attendent, ils seront très empressés de faire parvenir leur réponse a Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires et envoyés extraordinaires des Etats Unis. Les soussignés, en attendant, prient Messieurs les ministres Américains d'agréer l'assurance de leur parfaite considération.

BONAPARTE,
C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

PARIS, 16 Prairial, (5th June,) year 8.

The undersigned, ministers of the French republic, participate with the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, in the desire which they express, in their note of the 12th of this month, that the negotiation with which they are respectively charged should be brought to a speedy and favorable issue. The ministers of France, in acknowledging the receipt of the note which the ministers of the United States were pleased to address to them, the 18th Floreal, have had the honor to state that the examination of its contents would occasion some delay. That note has been since that time the subject of their most serious attention. After mature deliberation, they considered the propositions which it contained of a nature to require submission, for ultimate decision, to the Government of the republic. The ministers plenipotentiary have, therefore, transmitted it to the Minister of Exterior Relations, by whom they are informed that he has himself deemed it necessary to take the direction of the First Consul. As soon as the undersigned shall have received the expected instructions, they will hasten to transmit their answer to the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States.

Meanwhile, the undersigned pray the American ministers to accept the assurance of their perfect consideration.

FLEURIEU,

The following letter was received from C. Lee, Esq. acting as Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, 22*d May*, 1800.

GENTLEMEN:

Since the letter at Burgos, 10th February, which was received early in April, the President has not had the pleasure of receiving a letter from any of the envoys to the French republic. But by various European gazettes, intelligence has reached him of your safe arrival in Paris, in the beginning of March, and, before many days shall elapse, he hopes to receive information from you upon the subject of your mission.

The unexpected and unavoidable delays after you left Lisbon may possibly have the consequence of your retarding your return home so long that this letter will find you at Paris; and, in contemplation of such a possibility, it is written.

Congress adjourned on the 14th instant. The most material acts of the session were the following:

An act on the subject of bankruptcies.

An act authorizing the President to borrow three millions and a half of dollars.

Sundry acts continuing the system of maritime defence, and the prohibitions of commerce in regard to the French republic, and her dominions, as they stood at the commencement of the session.

And an act for disbanding the additional twelve regiments, excepting the artillerists, and engineers, part thereof, on or before the 15th of June next.

Whatever may be the result of your negotiation, in the present state of France and the United States, this part of the military establishment was not deemed indispensably necessary. A considerable saving of money would be the immediate consequence; and if your negotiation should fail to restore peace and harmony between the two countries, a greater portion of the resources of the United States would remain to be expended more advantageously than in the support of an army. This alteration in the defensive system was very generally approved in the Senate and House of Representatives, just before the session was closed.

The judicial system remains as it stood. Our country is at present blessed with the prospect of a most plentiful harvest of wheat and rye, and the losses of our merchants, arising from depredations, are considerably diminished. I am instructed to express the President's hope that your reception at Paris has been agreeable, and that your mission has been accomplished in a manner entirely satisfactory, or, if not accomplished, that the negotiation is near a happy conclusion; and, at the same time, to add his wishes that you may soon return in health and happiness to the bosom of our beloved country.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c.

CHARLES LEE,
Now executing the office of Secretary of State.

The American ministers having been officially advised that their notes of the 8th and 25th of May, with the details accompanying them, had been submitted to the Minister of Exterior Relations, were also soon afterwards confidentially informed that the whole business was referred to the decision of the Premier Consul, who was then in Italy; and about the —— of June, Joseph Bonaparte, president of the commission, set out for the head-quarters of the army. The object of his journey to the Premier Consul was not publicly known, nor was his departure announced to the American ministers. The battle of Marengo took place on the 14th day of June, and the Premier Consul returned to Paris the 3d of July; Joseph Bonaparte also arrived a few days afterwards. While the American ministers sincerely regretted the delay occasioned by the above unexpected circumstances, they supposed it probable that the Premier Consul might not have had sufficient leisure, amidst the active operations of the armies, to determine upon the several matters respecting the treaty, and that his decision and instructions might have been postponed until his return to Paris. At a meeting, however, on the 6th of July, they were of opinion that they had then made a proper allowance for all circumstances that might have countenanced delay on the part of the French ministers, and addressed to them the following note:

PARIS, July 6, 1800.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

Presuming, as the undersigned envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States do, that you are now acquainted with the ulterior views of your Government, respecting the negotiation between the United States and the French republic, they request the honor of a conference on that subject, at such time and place as may be most convenient for you. They trust that the unfortunate delays, which have hitherto attended the business, will justify their hopes of bringing it to a speedy close.

Accept, citizen ministers, the assurance of their high consideration,

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

To Messieurs JOSEPH BONAPARTE, FLEURIEU, AND RŒDERER,
Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

The next day the American ministers were invited to dine on the 11th with the president of the French commission; and, as no answer had been received to the note of the 6th, it was agreed that the 11th should be considered by them as the time appointed for the conference; the object of which, on their part, was to ascertain the difficulties which seemed to have arrested all progress on the part of the French ministers; to designate, with more precision, the real grounds of difference; and, if possible, to adopt some arrangement that would accelerate the negotiation. On the 11th, before dinner, M. Bonaparte informed them that the whole business of the treaty was now under the consideration of the Premier Consul, and that his decisions and instructions were expected in the course of a few days, when the notes and propositions received would be immediately answered. The American ministers repeated their regret at the long delay which had taken place; and, upon their expressing the desire that a conference should be held that evening, the French ministers readily consented. After the objects of requesting an interview were stated, the president of the French commission said they would frankly state the difficulties which had arisen with their Government: although they had not received officially its determination or instructions, they believed they were possessed of its present sentiments and opinions, and could not avoid adding that they accorded with those of the commission. He then declared that it was the decided opinion of the Premier Consul that the ancient treaties ought to be the basis of negotiation: that compensation could only be a consequence of the existence of the treaties, and the re-establishment under them of the former privileges and relations; and that he would never consent to make a treaty which would surrender the exclusive rights of France, in effect, in favor of an enemy; or, in any event, make a treaty with the United States, which would not place France on a footing of equality at least with Great Britain. He thought it would be derogatory to the present Government to make a treaty, less advantageous and less honorable that that made by the royal Government. Discussions of some length took place on the most important points: but, as the whole business, on the part of the French ministers, was under reference to their Government, no point could of course be settled; and the conference closed with the request of the French ministers that all they had said should be considered merely as confidential.

After several deliberations on the difficulties which had now completely arrested the progress of the negotiation, and the selection of some expedient which might remove them, the American ministers at length determined to request an early interview, and make a proposal to the effect that the payment of the indemnities should be suspended until the Government of the United States should have offered to France an article, re-establishing her in the exclusive privileges she claimed, under the treaty of 1778. It was considered that the American Government might or might not perform this condition, after a further view of the political state of Europe, and the possession of more ample means to estimate a promise of indemnity. It was also clearly perceived that, unless the indemnities were secured by some means under the present negotiation, they would be forever lost.

At an interview to-day with the French ministers, the following proposition was delivered to them in writing:

"Indemnities to be ascertained and secured in the manner proposed in our project of a treaty, but not to be paid until the United States shall have offered to France an article, stipulating free admission into the ports of each for the privateers and prizes of the other, and the exclusion of those of their enemies; nor unless the article be offered within seven years: such article to have the same effect, in point of priority, as a similar provision had in the treaty of 1778.

"JULY 15, 1800."

The circumstances which motived the proposition and its principle were briefly explained on the part of the American ministers, who concluded by adding, that an answer was not expected at that interview. There was, however, no difficulty in perceiving, that the first impression was not perfectly satisfactory to the French ministers; their observations took the same course they had done the preceding conference, and were answered on the same principles. Upon the American ministers expressing their wish to receive an answer to this and their former propositions as speedily as possible, the French ministers repeated their professions on that head; adding, that the observations they had made in these interviews were to be considered as merely hypothetical and unofficial.

JULY 20.

Meeting the French ministers to-day at M. Rœderer's, it was agreed to press them again officially for an answer. An interview took place after dinner, and M. Bonaparte said that he had seen the Minister of Exterior Relations that morning, on the business of the negotiation; and that he was assured that in a few days they should receive the decision and instructions of their Government.

JULY 23.

The American ministers, having taken into consideration the importance of the discussions which took place at the late interviews, thought it expedient to address the following note to the French ministers:

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PARIS, July 23, 1800.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The envoys of the United States being apprehensive lest possibly their remarks to the ministers of the French republic, in the two last conferences which led to and accompanied their written proposition, may not have been fully comprehended, from being expressed in a language but imperfectly understood, they have thought proper to reduce the substance of them to writing.

As to the proposition of placing France, with respect to an asylum for privateers and prizes, upon the footing of equality with Great Britain, it was remarked, that the right which had accrued to Great Britain, in that respect, was that of an asylum for her own privateers and prizes, to the exclusion of those of her enemies; wherefore, it was physically impossible that her enemies should at the same time have a similar right.

With regard to the observation, that by the terms of the British treaty the rights of France were reserved, and, therefore, the rights of Great Britain existed with such limitation as would admit of both nations being placed on a footing which should be equal, it was observed by the envoys of the United States, that the saving in the British treaty was only of the rights of France resulting from her then existing treaty; and that that treaty having ceased to exist, the saving necessarily ceased also, and the rights, which before that event were only contingent, immediately attached and became operative.

With respect to the supposition that the treaties with France yet continued to exist, it was remarked, that a treaty being a mutual compact, a palpable violation of it by one party did, by the law of nature and of nations, leave it optional with the other to renounce and declare the same to be no longer obligatory, and that, of necessity, there being no common tribunal to which they could appeal, the remaining party must decide whether there had been such violation on the other part as to justify its renunciation. For a wrong decision it would doubtless be responsible to the injured party, and might give cause for war; but, even in such case, its act of public renunciation, being an act within its competence, would not be a void but a valid act; and other nations, whose rights might thereby be beneficially affected, would so regard it: that it had become impossible for the United States to save their commerce from the depredations of French cruizers, but by resorting to defensive measures; and that as, by their constitution, existing treaties were the supreme law of the land, and the judicial department, who must be governed by them, is not under the control of the executive, or legislative, it was also impossible for them to legalize defensive measures, incompatible with the French treaties, while they continued to exist. Then it was that they were formally renounced, and from that renunciation there resulted necessarily a priority in favour of the British treaty, as to an exclusive asylum for privateers and prizes. A right, indeed, which she has made little use of, and with respect to which it would be unconsequential, during the remainder of the present war, whether she or France possessed it; but as it was a vested right, neither the Government of the United States nor their ministers could, with good faith, stipulate to France a right inconsistent with it.

To the still further suggestion that the law of nations admitted a dissolution of treaties only by mutual consent or war, it was remarked by the undersigned, that their conviction was clearly otherwise; and that Vattel, in particular, the best approved of modern writers, not only held that a treaty violated by one party might for that reason be renounced by the other, but that, when there were two treaties between the same parties, one might be rendered void in that way, and the other remain in force: whereas, when war dissolves, it dissolves all treaties existing between the parties at the time.

It appearing, however, to be the ultimate opinion of the French ministers that it did not comport with the honor of France to be deprived of that right, and at the same time to be called upon for compensation, the undersigned, solicitous for the honor of France as well as that of America, devised and offered, as their last effort, the written proposition alluded to, which, it was conceived, did essentially remove the difficulty. Its object was to suspend the payment of compensation, a consideration of much weight in the estimate of the United States, until France could be put into complete possession of the privilege she contended for; and, at the same time, to give that security, which a great pecuniary pledge would amount to, for her having the privilege, as soon as it could be given with good faith, which might, perhaps, be in a little more than two years, and at any rate within seven.

Accept, citizen ministers, the assurance of their high consideration.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

JULY 27.

The following answer was received:

PARIS, le 8 Thermidor, an 8.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ont reçu la note du 23 Juillet, 1800, (4 Thermidor, an 8) que Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires et ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis d'Amérique ont pris la peine de leur adresser.

Cette note a deux objets:

Le premier est de résumer les réponses qui ont été faites par Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis à quelques unes des réflexions présentées par les ministres plénipotentiaires de France, dans deux conférences antérieures, au sujet du droit d'asile dans les ports des Etats Unis et de la France, qui a été réciproquement et exclusivement assuré aux corsaires de chacune des deux nations, pour leurs bâtimens et leurs prises, par le traité de 1778; droit que Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis ont pretendu être abrogé entre la France et les Etats Unis, et établi au préjudice de la France, entre les Etats Unis et l'Angleterre.

Le deuxième objet de la note est de motiver la proposition faite par Messieurs les ministres Américains dans la dernière conférence, et tendante à stipuler que les indemnités qui pourraient être dues aux Etats Unis, "ne seront payées que lorsque les Etats Unis auront offert à la république Française un article stipulant la libre admission dans les ports de chacun des deux etats des corsaires et des prises des deux parties, à l'exclusion de leurs ennemis; et même que ces indemnités ne seront point payées, à moins que l'article ne soit offert dans sept ans: cet article devant avoir le même effet sur le point de la priorité que la stipulation semblable avait dans les traités de 1778."

Relativement au premier objet, les ministres Français sont obligés de répéter que leurs instructions portant entièrement sur la reconnoissance parfaite des anciens traités, ils se voient dans l'impossibilité de souscrire à l'anéantissement du privilége assuré par le traité de 1778 aux corsaires de chacune des deux nations dans les ports de l'autre, et surtout à l'établissement de ce privilége dans les relations mutuelles des Etats Unis et de la Grande Bretagne.

Mais, convaincu que le véritable intérêt de la France est étroitement lié à la prospérité des Etats Unis, et la prospérité des Etats Unis à leur parfaite indépendance; convaincu, aussi, que le droit exclusif accordé par une nation aux corsaires d'une autre d'amener leurs prises dans ses ports, est de nature à compromettre sa tranquillité, et, par là, son indépendance, soit parcequ'il doit en nombre de cas donner de justes griefs, ou au moins de l'ombrage aux Puissances sur qui sont faites les prises; ils s'empressent de répéter, en même tems, à Messieurs les ministres Américains, qu'en cas de rapprochement, ils se feront un devoir d'insister près de leur Gouvernement sur la proposition qu'ils lui ont déjà faite d'abolir tout droit exclusif d'entrée dans les ports respectifs pour les corsaires des deux nations, avec leurs prises, et de se réduire pour eux au droit d'amener leurs prises en concurrence avec les nations les plus favorisées. Ils croyent que le Gouvernement Français s'honorera par le sacrifice d'un privilége, qui pourrait être préjudiciable à son allié; mais qu'il s'avilirait en s'en depouillant au profit de son ennemi, et sans avantage pour l'indépendance Américaine. Les ministres Français n'ont trouvé dans la note du 23 Juillet, 1800, aucune raison qui les déterminat à regarder les traités faits entre la France et les Etats Unis comme rompus.

L'acte du Congrès du 9 Juillet, 1798, est la déclaration de l'une des deux parties; mais les traités etaient l'ouvrage de deux. Une seule ne peut pas détruire autrement que par la guerre et la victoire ce qui est l'engagement de deux.

Quand le Congrès déclare d'un côté que la France a contravenu aux traités, et qu'il s'en exhonère, et que de l'autre le Gouvernement François déclare qu'il s'est conformé aux traités, que les Etats Unis les ont seuls enfreints, et qu'il en veut l'exécution; où est la loi, où est le tribunal qui autorise l'exonération plutot que l'exécution?

Tant qu'il y a contestation entre deux parties contractantes sur l'existance ou l'anéantissement d'un traité, il ne peut résulter, de l'anéantissement prétendu par l'une de ces parties, aucun droit au profit d'un tiers.

Si la France avait déclaré les traités annullés, et que les Etats Unis eussent soutenus qu'ils étaient entiers, l'Angleterre n'aurait pas été fondée à dire à l'Amérique, j'entre dans les droits de la France. Cela est hors de doute. La déclaration de rupture faite par une des parties n'opère donc pas la rupture.

Ces réflexions sont conformes à la doctrine de tous les publicistes.

L'opinion de Vattel ne peut s'entendre que de la nullité de droit, mais non de la nullité de fait; et c'est la nullité de fait qui seule peut donner ouverture aux droits d'un tiers pour l'antériorité.

Ces reflexions découlent d'ailleurs de la nature des choses. S'il est libre à une partie contractante de se dégager quand il lui plait, en vertu de son propre jugement sur les faits, sur les hommes, sur les choses, il n'y a plus d'engagement attaché aux traités; il faut rayer de toutes les langues le mot traité.

Si un droit d'antériorité pourrait être détruit au préjudice de la nation qui le possède, par le fait seul de la partie qui l'a reconnu, et si par ce seul fait ce droit passait à un tiers, il faudrait reconnaitre comme principe, qu'une nation qui fait un second traité, suscite un ennemi à celle avec qui elle en a fait un premier, et qu'elle assure sa dépouille à cet ennemi pour le moment où elle voudra s'entendre avec lui.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ne pousseront pas plus loin leurs observations. Celles qu'ils viennent de reproduire suffisent pour établir les droits de la France; et lui assurer l'honneur du sacrifice qu'elle ferait en renonçant au droit exclusif d'entrée dans les ports d'Amérique pour les corsaires Français, accompagnés de leurs prises.

Passant au second objet de la note, les ministres de France observent que la proposition de Messieurs les ministres Américains offre à la république, pour un tems éloigné, l'espérance d'avantages exclusifs dont ils croyent qu'elle ne doit point être jalouse, et pour le moment présent, et peut-être pour sept années consécutives, une déchéance humiliante de ses droits et une infériorité honteuse à l'égard d'un état sur lequel elle avait acquis des privilèges par les services qu'elle a rendu à l'Amérique pendant qu'il lui faisait la guerre. Quand les ministres de France pourraient souscrire à une condition indigne de la nation Française, le prix qu'ils voudraient mettre à son humiliation ne serait pas la prorogation d'un assujettissement qu'ils regardent comme contraire à l'intérêt des Etats Unis. La dépendance de ses alliés ne peut être pour elle l'indemnité d'une souffrance nationale. Les ministres Français croyent devoir insister près de leur Gouvernement pour l'abdication actuelle d'un privilége bien acquis; il serait contradictoire qu'ils en ménagassent le retour pour des tems éloignés.

Ils ont l'honneur d'assurer Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis de leur haute considération.

J. BONAPARTE,
FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, 8th Thermidor, (26th August,) year 8.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic have received the note dated 23d July, 1800, (4th Thermidor, year 8,) which the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of America have been pleased to address to them.

That note has two objects:

The first, to recapitulate the answers which had been given by the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, at two former conferences, to the remarks then made by the ministers plenipotentiary of France, on the subject of the right of asylum, in the ports of the United States and France, which had been assured to the privateers and prizes of both nations, reciprocally, and exclusively, by the treaty of 1778: a right which the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States maintained had been annulled between France and the United States, and established, to the injury of France, between the United States and England.

The second object of the note is, to explain the proposition, made by the American ministers, at the last conference, by which they offered to stipulate that the indemnities which may be due to the United States, "shall not be paid, until the United States shall have offered to the French republic an article stipulating free admission, in the ports of each, for the privateers and prizes of the other, and the exclusion of those of their enemies; and, moreover, that these indemnities shall not be paid unless the article shall be offered within seven years: such article to have the same effect, in point of priority, as a similar provision in the treaty of 1778."

As to the first object, the ministers of the French republic are compelled to repeat, that their instructions, predicated on the complete recognition of the ancient treaties, leave them no power to consent to the extinguishment of a right, confirmed by the treaty of 1778, by which the privateers of the two nations, respectively, are allowed to enter the ports of each other; and, least of all, to consent to the incorporation of that right with the existing relations between the United States and Great Britain.

But being convinced that the true interest of France is closely connected with that of the United States, and that the prosperity of the United States mainly depends on their complete independence; being convinced, also, that an exclusive right, conferred by one nation upon another, to bring prizes into her ports, has a tendency to compromit tranquillity, and by that means endanger independence: inasmuch, as, in a number of cases, causes either of complaint or of distrust must be given to the Power from whom prizes have been taken; the undersigned hasten to repeat to the American ministers the proposition already made, that, in the event of a reconciliation being effected, they will consider it their duty to urge upon their Government to abolish the exclusive right to enter the ports of each other, with privateers and their prizes; and to limit this privilege to that enjoyed by the most favored nation. They believe that France would do herself honor by the voluntary sacrifice of a privilege prejudicial to her allies; but that, to consent to be despoiled of that privilege, for the benefit of an enemy, without thereby contributing to American independence, would exhibit to the world a striking instance of self-degradation.

The ministers of France cannot discover, in the note of the 23d July, 1800, any reason to incline them to the supposition that the treaties between France and the United States* are abrogated.

When, on the one hand, Congress declare that France has contravened these treaties, and that the United States are released from their stipulations; and when, on the other, the Government of France declares that she has conformed to these treaties, that she desires their execution, and that the United States alone have infringed them; where is the tribunal or the law to enforce the exoneration, in preference to the execution?

So long as a difference exists between two contracting parties, respecting the existence or abrogation of a treaty, no right or benefit can result to a third party from the abrogation contended for by one.

If France had declared the treaties annulled, and the United States had maintained their validity, England would have no ground for saying to America, "We succeed to the rights of France." There is no foundation, even for a doubt, whether a treaty is cancelled by the declaration of its abrogation made by one only of the parties.

These reflections are in conformity with the doctrines advanced by all writers upon the laws of nations.

The opinion of Vattel can only be understood of a nullity in point of right, not of a nullity in fact: and it is only a nullity in fact that can give an opening, respecting the claims of anteriority, to rights resulting to a third party.

These reflections, moreover, arise from the very nature of things. If one of two contracting parties is at liberty, whenever he may please, to cancel his obligations, in virtue of his own judgment concerning facts, or men, or things, no binding force can be attached to treaties, and the term itself should be erased from every language.

If the right of anteriority can be destroyed, to the prejudice of the nation that possesses it, by the sole act of one of the parties by whom that right has been recognized, it must be acknowledged as a principle, that the nation making the second treaty converts the one with whom she had first contracted into an enemy; and that she may be certain of being despoiled by that enemy whenever the time may be propitious for an open explanation.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic refrain from pursuing these observations. What has been said already will suffice to establish the rights of France, and to ensure to herself the honor of a sacrifice which she would make by renouncing the exclusive right under which the privateers of France, together with their prizes, are entitled to enter the American ports.

Passing to the second object of the note, the ministers of France observe, that the proposition of the American ministers offers to the republic, at a remote period, the hope of enjoying exclusive advantages, of which, in the mean time, they think that France should not be jealous; and at the present moment, perhaps for seven years to come, it tenders the humiliating forfeiture of privileges acquired by effective services to America in time of war, and a degrading inferiority to a rival Power, at whose expense these privileges were first obtained. When the ministers of France shall subscribe to a condition so unworthy of the French nation, the price of her humiliation will assuredly not be the simple postponement of a state of subjugation, which she regards as inconsistent with the interests of the United States. The dependence of her allies will never be considered a suitable indemnity for the wrongs she may endure. The ministers of France, believing it their duty to recommend to their Government the surrender of a privilege honorably acquired, might be charged with inconsistency if they should prudently provide for its restoration at a distant period.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic can, therefore, only await the final determination of their Government; and, whenever received, they will hasten to transmit it to the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States.

They have the honor to assure the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of their high consideration.

J. BONAPARTE,
FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

AUGUST 11.

The following note was received from the French ministers:

PARIS, 23 Thermidor, an 8.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ont reçu de leur Gouvernement les nouvelles instructions qu'ils se sont cru obligés de demander lorsqu'ils ont appris, par la note inattendue de Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires d'Amérique, que les Etats Unis tenaient leurs traités avec la France pour annullés, et qu'il leur etait impossible de les reconnaitre avec tous les avantages attachés à leur date. Les ministres Français s'empressent de présenter à Messieurs les ministres Américains les réflexions et les ouvertures que l'état actuel de la négociation leur a paru exiger.

* The act of Congress of July 9, 1798, is the declaration of one of two parties; but the treaties were the work of two. A compact formed by two can be destroyed by one in no other way except by war and victory.

D'abord ils insisteront sur le principe déjà établi dans leur précédente note, savoir: que les traités qui ont uni la France et les Etats Unis ne sont point rompus; que la guerre même n'aurait pu les rompre; mais que l'état de mésintelligence qui a regné quelque tems entre la France et les Etats Unis, par le fait de quelques agens plutot que par la volonté des Gouvernemens respectifs, n'a nullement été un état de guerre, au moins du côté de la France.

Si les réflexions présentées à ce sujet dans la note des ministres Français du 8 du présent mois suffisent pour amener Messieurs les ministres des Etats Unis à la reconnaissance des traités, la première conséquence qui en résultera, et que les ministres de France s'empresseront de reconnaitre de nouveau, c'est que de part et d'autre les parties doivent s'indemniser du dommage qu'elles ont pu se causer mutuellement par leur mésintelligence. Les anciens traités étant maintenus dans leur intégrité et dans leur antériorité, il sera juste et convenable de faire cesser jusqu'au souvenir des altercations survenus dans le cours des relations qu'ils ont établies.

Ainsi, la première proposition des ministres de France est de stipuler une reconnaissance pleine et entière des traités, et l'engagement réciproque d'indemnités pour les dommages résultants de part et d'autre de leur infraction.

Si Messieurs les ministres Américains persistaient à croire qu'ils se sont mis dans l'impossibilité de reconnaitre les traités avec l'avantage de leur date, s'il etait prouvé que mal àpropos la France s'est flattée d'une amitié non interrompue avec les Etats Unis, qu'inutilement elle consacrerait sa fidelité à ses engagements en souscrivant à réparer les infractions commises par quelques agens et quelques corsaires, le Gouvernement Français consentirait à l'abolition des traités avec d'autant moins de répugnance que Messieurs les ministres d'Amérique paraissent en regarder quelques dispositions comme peu compatible avec la parfaite indépendance des Etats Unis. Telle est celle dont ils parlent dans la note du 18 Floreal, (8 Mai) lorsqu'ils expriment le désir de réduire les corsaires des nations étrangeres à la simple hospitalité dans les Etats Unis, afin d'affranchir leur commerce de toute gêne, et leur politique de tout rapport avec les intérets et les passions des Puissances belligérantes. Le Gouvernement Français est convaincu que la plus parfaite indépendance est nécessaire aux Etats Unis, pour les élever à leurs hautes destinées, et il ferait volontiers le sacrifice des avantages qui pourraient la compromettre, quelque bien acquis qu'ils soient, de quelque réciprocité et de quelques services qu'ils ayent été payés.

En conséquence, ils déclarent que la réclamation des traités, et l'offre d'en réparer l'inexécution, s'il y en avait lieu, réclamation dictée uniquement par une scrupuleuse fidelité à ses engagemens, d'ailleurs avantageux aux Etats Unis, ferait aisément place à des vues conformes à l'intérêt d'indépendance et de sécurité qui les occupe; ils déclarent notamment que la France ne refuserait pas de se départir du privilège exclusif dont jouissaient ses corsaires pour l'introduction de leurs prises dans les ports des Etats Unis. Toutefois les ministres de France, en acquiesçant à l'anéantissement des traités, ne pourraient se dissimuler que l'acte par lequel les Etats Unis en ont déclaré la nullité, a été une véritable provocation de guerre, que les actes hostiles qui ont suivi cette provocation, ceux qui ont été multipliée avec tant d'éclat même depuis que le Gouvernement Français ont fait cesser tout prétexte de plainte de la part des Etats Unis, ont été la guerre elle même; que la France s'est déguisée le véritable état de ses dernières relations avec les Etas Unis, lorsqu'elle les a regardées comme une simple mésintelligence réparable et passagère. En un mot, qu'un nouveau traité entre la France et les Etats Unis doit être, avant tout, un traité de paix; partant de cette observation il leur semble que les deux Gouvernemens n'auraient plus de ce moment à s'occuper de leurs pertes respectives, vu que le droit de la guerre dispense de réparer ses ravages, et que l'honneur des armes nationales défend même de s'en occuper, puisque celui des etats, qui aurait une balance à payer à l'autre, en l'acquittant reconnaitrait un vainqueur, et acheterait la paix.

Au reste, il doit être bien entendu qu'en acquiesçant à l'abolition des traités, le Gouvernement Français n'entendrait renoncer qu'au privilège qu'ils assuraient à la France, et qu'il ne souscrira jamais à se placer sur une ligne inférieure à celle d'aucune autre Puissance dans ses relations avec les Etats Unis. Il renoncerait, sans peine, à ses avantages exclusifs dont il jouissait, mais il ne peut consentir que d'autres en exercent à son préjudice. Il abdiquérait sans regret un droit qui lui était acquis, mais ne reconnaitra pas celui d'un autre fond sur la ruine du sien. Ce qu'il doit à sa dignité, il le doit et le veut même pour la prospérité des Etats Unis. S'ils se dégagent envers la France des liens qui pesaient peut-être à leur indépendance, ce doit être pour l'établir plus parfaite que jamais, et non pour le courber d'un côté opposé. La seconde proposition des ministres de France, dans le cas où celle qui précéde ne serait point acceptée, serait donc l'abolition des traités anciens, la formation d'un traité nouveau dans lequel la nation Française, laissant de côté un privilège désagréable aux Etats Unis, serait traitée pour ses rapports politiques et commerciaux comme la nation la plus favorisée, et où il ne serait pas question d'indemnités.

Ainsi la proposition que les ministres Français ont l'honneur de communiquer à Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis, se réduit à cette alternative fort simple:

Ou les anciens traités, avec les priviléges résultant de l'antériorité et stipulations d'indemnité réciproque:

Ou un nouveau traité assurant l'égalité sans indemnité.

Messieurs les ministres Américains reconnaitront, sans doute, dans cette double ouverture, et dans l'exposé des motifs qui la determinent, le désir qu'a le Gouvernement Français de terminer la négociation d'une manière satisfaisante pour les Etats Unis.

Les ministres de France ont l'honneur d'assurer Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis de leur haute considération.

PARIS, 23 Thermidor, (11*th August*,) year 8.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic have received from their Government the new instructions which they thought themselves obliged to ask, when they were informed, by the unexpected note of the ministers plenipotentiary of America, that the United States considered their treaties with France as annulled, and that the validity of these treaties could not be recognized, with all the advantages attached to their date. The French ministers hasten to present to the ministers of the United States the reflections and overtures which the actual state of the negotiation appears to demand.

In the first place, they insist upon the principle already established in their former note, viz: that the treaties by which France and the United States have been united are not annulled; that war itself could not have annulled them; and that the misunderstanding which, through the agency of individuals more than the intention of the respective Governments, has for some time existed between France and the United States, has not constituted a state of war, at least on the part of France.

If the reflections presented by the French ministers on this subject, in their note of the 8th instant, have been sufficient to induce the American ministers to admit the validity of these treaties, it would follow, as a necessary consequence, that the ministers of France would hasten to renew the declaration that the parties should be reciprocally indemnified for injuries mutually sustained during the existence of that misunderstanding. If the treaties are preserved unimpaired, as originally concluded, it would be just and proper to extinguish even the remembrance of the recriminations which have occurred during the period of their existence.

The first proposition, then, of the ministers of France is, to stipulate a full and entire recognition of the treaties, and a reciprocal promise of indemnities for the damages resulting, on the part of either, from their infraction.

If the American ministers shall continue to believe that they possess no authority to recognize the validity of the ancient treaties, with the advantage arising from their date; if it shall appear that France has been only deceiving herself with delusive hopes, while relying upon an uninterrupted friendship with the United States; and that, in consenting to indemnify the injuries committed by a few privateers and some unauthorized agents, she has made only a useless display of her sacred adherence to her own engagements; the Government of France will, nevertheless, consent to the abrogation of the treaties; and with the less reluctance, because the American ministers have appeared to consider some of their stipulations as incompatible with the perfect independence of the United States.

Such is the provision referred to in the note of the American ministers of the 18th Floreal, (8th May,) in which the desire is expressed to restrict the privateers of foreign nations, within the ports of the United States, to the rights of hospitality, in order to liberate the commerce of the United States from every restraint, and free their political relations from all connexion with the interests and passions of the belligerent Powers. The Government of France is convinced that it is only a complete independence that can advance the United States to the highest point of prosperity; and it agrees to make a willing sacrifice of advantages which may endanger that independence, however ample the equivalent by which they were acquired, and with whatsoever reciprocity or services it may have been repaid.

They, therefore, declare that the demands concerning the treaties, and the offer to repair the damages arising from their infraction, if an infraction has taken place, (a demand dictated by a scrupulous fidelity to engagements, and, at the same time, advantageous to the United States,) will now easily give place to the views, dictated by considerations of interest, independence, and security, with which they are now occupied: they especially declare, that they will not refuse to relinquish the exclusive privilege enjoyed by the privateers of France, to carry their prizes into the ports of the United States. Whilst, however, the ministers of France acquiesce in the nullity of the treaties, they cannot conceal from themselves that the act of the United States, by which their abrogation has been declared, has been an unequivocal provocation to war; that the hostile acts, by which this provocation has been followed, increasing in number and publicity, even after France had removed every just cause of complaint, were nothing less than war; that France had desired to be insensible to the real state of her extraordinary relations with the United States; in a word, that a new treaty between France and the United States ought to be preceded by a treaty of peace. If the correctness of these observations is admitted, it would seem that the two Governments ought to be occupied no longer with their respective losses: the rights of war acknowledge no obligation to repair its ravages: their consideration even is prohibited by national honor, since the State inflicting the greatest injury would, by making compensation, acknowledge a victor and purchase peace.

As to the rest, it must be perfectly understood that, in acquiescing in the annulment of these treaties, the French Government intends only to renounce the privileges which these treaties assured to France; and that France will never submit to be placed, in her relations with the United States, on a footing inferior to that of any other Power. She would renounce, without regret, the exclusive advantages she has enjoyed, but she cannot consent that other Powers shall enjoy the same advantages to her prejudice. She would relinquish freely the right she has acquired, but she will never acknowledge the right of another, founded on the destruction of her own. This she owes to her own character, and even to the prosperity of the United States. If it is the wish of the United States to be liberated from engagements which weigh, perhaps, too heavily on their national independence, they ought to desire the loosening of their fetters, in order to assume a more erect and imposing attitude, and not for the purpose of being bent with equal force in the opposite direction.

The second proposition of the ministers of France, in case the former shall not be accepted, will then be the abrogation of ancient treaties; the formation of a new treaty, in which the French nation, abandoning a privilege inconvenient to the United States, shall be placed, in her political and commercial relations, on an equal footing with the most favored nations; and an entire silence on the subject of indemnities.

Thus, the proposition which the ministers of France have the honor to communicate to the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States is reduced to this simple alternative:

Either the ancient treaties, carrying with them the privileges resulting from anteriority, together with stipulations for reciprocal indemnity;

Or a new treaty, promising equality, unattended with indemnities.

In this double overture, and the explanation accompanying it, the ministers of the United States will, without doubt, perceive the desire of the French Government to terminate the negotiation in a manner satisfactory to the United States.

The French ministers have the honor to assure the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of their high consideration.

AUGUST 15.

The following letter was written to the Secretary of State, and forwarded by the Franklin, sailing from Bourdeaux:

PARIS, August 15, 1800.

SIR:

Having ascertained, by an interview with the French ministers, soon after our note to them of the 8th of May, a copy of which you have doubtless received, that, as we refused to assume the former treaties, they could proceed no further without new instructions, and that a report on the state of the negotiation was preparing for the Minister of Exterior Relations, and ultimately for the Premier Consul; we judged it expedient, in order to obviate an apprehension that our Government contemplated further grants to the prejudice of France, and to diminish the hazard of sending off the business to the Premier Consul, then with the army in Switzerland, who, in a moment of agitation, might decide definitively upon it, to propose the following clause as an addition to the 32d article of our project, viz. "Nor will either of the said parties, while they continue in amity, make a treaty with any foreign Sovereign or state, stipulating for the privateers and prizes of such Sovereign or state, an asylum in the ports of each other, unless they shall have assured to each other such right of asylum for the privateers and prizes of each in the ports of the other:" and it was accordingly sent with the note marked A.

Embarrassing as the delay for new instructions was seen to be, it was nevertheless deemed inexpedient, in the then critical state of European affairs, to treat it as a studied delay.

On the 1st of June, we addressed the note marked B, and on the 5th, received an answer marked C.

Soon after the Premier's return from Italy, the note marked D was sent.

The requested interview took place on Friday, the 11th July; and although the French ministers declared that they had not received further instructions, yet, as they expressed a willingness to converse upon the subject, a conversation was entered upon, which had for its object to ascertain with more precision the grounds of difference between us. Their observations led to, and finally terminated in, this position: that, to be deprived of her former privileges in the ports of the United States, and that, too, in favor of an enemy, and at the same time to be called upon for compensation, was derogatory to the honor of France.

At a further interview, on the 15th July, we brought forward, in order to remove what seemed to be the difficulty at the interview on the 11th of July, a written proposal to suspend the actual payment of indemnities, on the condition of replacing France in the privileges she contended for. A condition which our Government might or might not perform, after it should have further seen the political state of Europe; and also been better able to estimate a promise of indemnity. The proposition was as follows, viz: "Indemnities to be ascertained and secured, in the manner proposed in our project of a treaty, but not to be paid until the United States shall have offered to France an article, stipulating free admission in the ports of each for the privateers and prizes of the other, to the exclusion of her enemies; nor unless the article shall be offered within seven years, such article to have the same effect, in point of priority, as a similar provision had in the treaty of 1778."

An immediate reply to the proposition was not pressed or wished; there was no difficulty, however, in perceiving that the impression was not perfectly satisfactory.

On the 23d of July, the note was sent, marked E, which throws some further light on the two preceding conferences.

The note marked G, purporting to be predicated on the new instructions, was received the 11th of August. This note is now under consideration, and will not be formally answered, till there has been an interview to ascertain some points.

It has, however, become manifest, that the negotiation must be abandoned, or our instructions deviated from. Should the latter be ventured upon, which, from present appearances, is not improbable, the deviation will be no greater than a change of circumstances may be presumed to justify.

The success of the French in Italy has produced an armistice, and has since opened with the Emperor a negotiation for peace, which is still pending. The result is daily and anxiously expected.

Captain McNeil, with the Portsmouth, arrived safe at Havre on the 23d of May, where he yet remains. The despatches sent by him were duly received.

We are, &c. &c.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

An interview took place with the French ministers on the subject of their note of the 23d Thermidor, for the purpose of ascertaining with more precision their views on some points which were supposed to be covered under the general terms of their note. The conference was opened, on the part of the American ministers, in a manner which they supposed would entitle them to the utmost candor and frankness. The French ministers were, however, extremely reserved, answering with great caution to every inquiry in the general terms of their note. The result of the conference was, of course, little satisfactory to the American ministers, who were consequently obliged to consider the French note in the general terms of its text. It now became necessary to decide whether the negotiation should be broken off, or the instructions departed from; whether the treaties should be revived, or the indemnities sacrificed; and, if the treaties were revived, whether, after considering the text of the French note, and the obstinacy with which the ministers adhered to it, an attempt should be made to effect a modification that might enable Government to extinguish the exclusive privileges of France under the treaty of amity and commerce, as well as her claims under the treaty of alliance. The following note became the result of several deliberations and discussions on these points, and was sent to the French ministers on the 20th of August:

PARIS, August 20, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The undersigned ministers have been honored with your note of the 23d Thermidor.

It adds to the regret, occasioned by three months' delay for further instructions, that they confirm the obstacles which had brought the negotiation to a stand.

To abandon indemnities would be illy to select the means of restoring France to the confidence of a nation, too long accustomed to revere and practise justice, ever to forget its demands. Nor could America ever conceive that, protecting from depredations her property which remains, had impaired a claim for that of which she has been despoiled. More difficult still of comprehension would it be, that she had aggressed by declaring the truth: for, doubtless, declaring that treaties ceased to bind her, which the other party had long and greatly infracted, was no more. If, however, that declaration, as necessary for judicial purposes as it was conformable to truth, had amounted to a cause of war, yet, as the wisdom of France reconciled it to peace, its application on the principle of war to the extinguishment of claims would be inexplicable. And even as to war itself, though it does by its rights, or rather by its usages enforced against weaker Powers, merge the injuries it operates, it does not cancel obligations prior to its existence. If war had actually commenced when it is suggested there was cause given, still, how could its rights be seen to extinguish the claims of America, as the mass of her sufferings was at a time when her conduct towards France was remarkable for nothing but the patience with which she endured, and the moderation with which she sought to remove them?

If, in applying the principle, or exercising the natural right of self-defence, in a state of things now mutually and equally lamented, certain events have taken place which might be regretted when considered in connexion with their cause; if these events have been attended with a sensation which the French ministers are pleased to term "éclat," they will have candor enough to admit that this sensibility was natural among men sore by repeated losses, and citizens who had thought their country degraded by her patience and long suffering. A mutual stipulation, however, of restoration or indemnity will save the honor of both nations, and efface with the hand of justice every irritating remembrance. It is but proper here to remark, that if the action, or the notice of it, to which the French ministers plenipotentiary have particularly alluded, be taken in connexion with dates and distances, the American Government cannot be charged with neglecting to avail itself of conciliatory measures.

In a word, while nothing would be more grateful to America than to acquit herself of any just claims of France, nothing could be more vain than an attempt to discover to her reasons for the rejection of her own.

It is time for the two nations to return from a state of things difficult to name, and more difficult to account for, to the correcter views of '78; to the confidence inspired by co-operating for an object equally interesting to both; to that spirit which disavowed the idea of founding pretensions on exertions; and, finally, to that friendship which knew not the alloy of purchase.

Too much concerned with that epoch not to recollect its professions, and too confident in the wisdom of those professions to despair of their fruits, the American ministers have persevered in efforts for a reconciliation. To remove obstacles interposed, they have developed their views and their doubts with more frankness than effect. To go further, they must take on themselves a high responsibility.

If, then, the dignity of one party cannot be satisfied without a recognition of former treaties, still less can the interests of the other dispense with a remodification of them.

The 17th article of the commercial treaty, which stipulated an exclusive admission for the privateers and prizes of each in the ports of the other, was but nominally reciprocal; not only because America would seldom be at war, but also by reason of the prior engagements of France under the treaty of Utrecht, then in force, and since renewed. The real reciprocity of that article was to be sought for in another, which made free goods in free ships—a stipulation greatly beneficial for the United States could they have enjoyed it. This stipulation, however, proved inconvenient to France, as appeared from her defeating the use of it so early in the present war; and for that reason, the undersigned ministers, in their project of a treaty, proposed to give it up, trusting that it would be deemed a full equivalent for abandoning, on the part of France, the first mentioned privilege stipulated to her.

The American ministers have shown, in their note of the 8th May, that the free admission of privateers is inconvenient to the United States, and the ministers plenipotentiary of France have reasoned, in a note of the 8th Thermidor, and assumed in others, that an exclusive admission of those of one nation compromits their independence. France, then, will not insist on that privilege for herself, exclusively and forever. She will not embarrass that progress to greatness, which, with so much reason and so much solicitude, she seeks to cherish; nor, least of all, compromit the independence she guaranties. Doubtless, upon a review of this claim, her ministers will be satisfied with the footing of the most favored nation; and, as to rights beyond that, will relinquish them gratuitously, or, at most, on terms not difficult to be complied with.

With respect to the 11th article of the treaty of alliance, it has produced mischievous apprehensions, and never can produce an effect which will not contravene its professed design. If France should not discern the utility of relinquishing this article, she will acquiesce in a specification which may render it less incompatible with her policy.

If the American ministers, in attending to the note before them, have avoided retracing the measures of the late French Government, which forced the United States to take the defensive position in which the present negotiation found them; if they have declined to renew former discussions, or have not availed themselves of the opportunity of commencing others: it is because time has become precious with them, and because also they yet think it may be more useful to search for means of healing the breach than for the causes which produced it.

As a further effort on their part to ascertain those means, they make the following propositions, predicated on the adoption of the first alternative in the overture of the French ministers plenipotentiary.

1. Let it be declared that the former treaties are renewed and confirmed, and shall have the same effect as if no misunderstanding between the two Powers had intervened, except so far as they are derogated from by the present treaty.

2. It shall be optional with either party to pay to the other within seven years three millions of francs, in money or securities, which may be issued for indemnities, and thereby to reduce the rights of the other as to privateers and prizes, to those of the most favored nation; and, during the said term allowed for option, the right of both parties shall be limited by the line of the most favored nation.

3. The mutual guaranty in the treaty of alliance shall be so specified and limited, that its future obligation shall be, on the part of France, when the United States shall be attacked, to furnish and deliver, at her own ports, military stores to the amount of one million of francs; and on the part of the United States, when the French possessions in America in any future war shall be attacked, to furnish and deliver, at their own ports, a like amount in provisions.

It shall, moreover, be optional for either party to exonerate itself wholly of its obligations, by paying to the other, within seven years, a gross sum of five millions of francs, in money, or such securities as may be issued for indemnities.

4. The articles of commerce and navigation, except the seventeenth article of the treaty, shall admit of modifications, reserving for their principle the rights of the most favored nation, where it shall not be otherwise agreed, and be limited in their duration to twelve years.

5. There shall be a reciprocal stipulation for indemnities, and these indemnities shall be limited to the claims of individuals, and adjusted agreeably to the principles and manner proposed by the American ministers in their project of a treaty heretofore delivered, except where it shall be otherwise agreed. Public ships taken on either side shall be restored or paid for.

6. All property seized by either party, and not yet definitively condemned, or which may be seized before the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, shall be restored on reasonable, though it should be informal, proof of its belonging to the other, except contraband goods of the United States destined to an enemy's port. This provision to take effect from the signature of the treaty; and if any condemnations should take place contrary to the intent of this stipulation, before knowledge of the same shall be obtained, the property so condemned shall be paid for without delay.

The ministers of the United States pray the ministers of the French republic to accept the assurance of their high consideration.

AUGUST 25.

The following note and propositions were received from the French ministers:

PARIS, 7 Fructidor, an 8 de la république Française.

Les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française ont reçu la note que Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis leur ont fait l'honneur de leur adresser le 2 du présent mois.

Ils n'ont pu regarder les ouvertures qui y sont jointes comme tombant sur la première partie de l'alternative proposée. En effet, la première des propositions sur lesquelles ils ont offert l'option etait, que les Etats Unis reconnussent explicitement les traités passés avec la France, avec tous les avantages d'antériorité attachés à leur date. Dans la dernière conférence, qui a eu lieu le 25ème Thermidor dernier, il a été bien entendu, et même rédigé par écrit, que cette première partie de l'alternative excluait essentiellement toute idée de modification tombant sur quelqu'un des points litigieux de la négociation, et notamment sur les priviléges assurés à la nation Française relativement à d'autres Puissances. Néanmoins, la note de Messieurs les ministres Américains propose une modification capitale de l'article XVII, et dès lors il est évident que cette note tombe sur la seconde branche de l'alternative, qui a consisté à offrir un nouveau traité sans indemnité.

Les ministres de France pourraient donc insister sur la condition de mettre à l'écart toute stipulation d'indemnités. Néanmoins, la France donnera aux Etats Unis une nouvelle preuve de ses dispositions amicales, en consentant tout à-la-fois à la modification de ses traités, et au principe des indemnités de la manière exprimée dans la note ci-jointe, où les Etats Unis trouveront indubitablement le désir d'une réconciliation prompte et entière.

Les ministres de la république Française ont l'honneur d'assurer Messieurs les ministres plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis de leur haute considération.

J. BONAPARTE,
C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

1. Les anciens traités seront continués et confirmés pour avoir leur exécution, comme s'il n'etait survenu aucune mésintelligence entre les deux nations.

2. Des commissaires seront nommés pour liquider les dommages respectifs.

3. L'article XVII du traité de commerce de 1778 sera conservé dans son integrité, avec une simple addition à la suite de ces mots, savoir: "Et, au contraire, ne sera donné asile ni rétraite dans leurs ports ou hâvres à ceux qui auront fait des prises sur les sujets de Sa Majesté, ou des Etats Unis;" il sera ajouté, "Si ce n'est en vertu de traités connus le jour de la signature du présent, et postérieur au traité de 1778, et ce pour l'espace de sept années."

Sur l'article XXII même réserve que sur l'article XVII.

4. Si dans l'espace de sept ans le rétablissement des articles XVII et XXII n'est offert et accepté dans sa plénitude, il n'y aura lieu à l'acquittement des indemnités résultantes du travail des commissaires.

5. La garantie stipulé par le traité d'alliance sera convertie en prestation de sécours de deux millions. Mais cette prestation ne sera rachetable que par un capital de dix millions.

PARIS, 7th Fructidor, (25th August,) year 8.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic have received the note which the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States have done them the honor to address to them the second of the present month.

They cannot regard the overtures therein contained as complying with the first part of the proposed alternative. In reality, the first of the propositions offered to the option of the American ministers was, that the United States should explicitly recognize the treaties they had concluded with France, with all the advantages attached to their date. In the last conference, which took place the 25th Thermidor, (13th August) it was well understood, and even reduced to writing, that this part of the alternative should particularly exclude every idea of a modification extending to the contested points of the negotiation, and especially to the privilege assured to the French nation, in relation to other Powers. Nevertheless, the note of the American ministers proposes an important modification of the seventeenth article: whence, it is evident that this note applies to the second branch of the alternative, which consisted in offering a new treaty without indemnity.

The French ministers might here insist upon the condition, that every stipulation on the subject of indemnities should be laid aside. Nevertheless, France will give the United States a new proof of her friendly disposition, in consenting to the modification of the treaties, and also to the principle of indemnities, in the manner expressed in the subjoined note: in which the United States will discover undoubted proofs of the desire of France to effect a speedy and complete reconciliation.

The ministers of the French republic have the honor to assure the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of their high consideration.

J. BONAPARTE.
C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

1. The ancient treaties shall be continued and confirmed; and they shall be carried into execution, in the same manner as if no misunderstanding had taken place between the two nations.

2. Commissioners shall be appointed to liquidate the respective damages.

3. The seventeenth article of the treaty of commerce of 1778 shall be preserved inviolate, with the single addition, at the end of the following words: "on the contrary, no shelter or refuge shall be given in their ports or harbors to such as shall have made prize of the subjects, people, or property of either of the parties:" "except in virtue of treaties known at the time of the signature of the present treaty, and subsequent to the treaty of 1778; and this for the space of seven years."

The twenty-second article to contain the same exception as the seventeenth.

4. If, in the space of seven years, the seventeenth and twenty-second articles shall not be offered and accepted in their original force, the indemnities awarded by the commissioners shall not be paid.

5. The guaranty, stipulated by the treaty of alliance, shall be converted into a promise of succor, to the amount of two millions; but this promise shall not be redeemable except by a capital of ten millions.

AUGUST 24.

As the French ministers dined to-day with Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie, they were requested to attend a conference after dinner, for the purpose of giving some explanations of the propositions subjoined to their note. Mr. Bonaparte and Mr. Fleurieu, mentioning they had some urgent business at the council, went away, leaving Mr. Rœderer authorized to give any explanation required. After a conversation of some length, during which Mr. Rœderer discovered how unsatisfactory those propositions were to the American ministers, he suggested the following idea for consideration, viz: "that the option contained in the note of the American ministers, to extinguish by an equivalent of eight millions of francs certain claims of France under the former treaties, ought to be reciprocal; so that, if the offer should be made by either party, the other should be bound to accept it:" saying that this suggestion ought not to be considered official, as his colleagues were not consulted. The next day it was reduced into the form of an article, and shown to Mr. Rœderer, to know whether the principle of his proposition was correctly taken; and upon its being stated to him in the form it was supposed to be made the preceding evening, and upon the article being translated, he admitted that he was correctly understood; and then delivered another proposition, which he said had been approved by the Minister of Exterior Relations, to the following effect:

"Si, dans l'espace de sept ans, le rétablissement des articles XVII et XXII, dans toute leur valeur, n'est offert, il n'y aura lieu à l'acquittement des indemnités liquidées par les commissaires; et si le rétablissement des articles XVII et XXII, dans toute leur plénitude, est offert dans l'espace de sept années, la France aura l'option entre ce rétablissement, ou un indemnité de huit millions, qui leur sera payé en argent, ou obligations données pour acquittement des indemnités liquidées par les commissaires."

NOTA. (said to have been added by the Minister of Exterior Relations) "Il est entendu, et il sera stipulé, conformément à une note de Messieurs les ministres d'Amérique, que le privilége des prises étant aboli pour la France et pour l'Angleterre à l'expiration du traité, l'Amérique ni la France ne le donneront plus à personne."

[TRANSLATION.]

"If, in the space of seven years, the renewal of the 17th and 22d articles, in their full meaning, shall not be offered, the indemnities which the commissioners may award shall not be paid; and if the renewal of the 17th and 22d articles, in their full meaning, shall be offered within the space of seven years, France shall have the option, between this renewal and an indemnity of eight millions, which shall be paid to her in money, or in obligations given for the payment of indemnities which shall have been awarded by the commissioners."

NOTE, (said to have been added by the Minister of Exterior Relations.) "It is understood, and shall be stipulated, in conformity with a note of the American ministers, that, whenever the privilege respecting prizes shall be abolished, as to France and England, by the expiration of the treaty, neither the United States nor France shall again concede it to any Power whatever."

AUGUST 29.

The American ministers intended to avail themselves of another conference to-day with the French ministers; but the president of the French commission and Mr. Rœderer had gone into the country on the 27th, and were not returned this morning; therefore, with the expectation of attracting the earliest attention of the ministers to the business of the negotiation, the following note was addressed to them and sent to Mr. Fleurieu:

PARIS, August 29, 1800. 7 o'clock, P. M.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTERS:

The envoys of the United States have given the most serious attention to the note and the propositions enclosed, which the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic did them the honor to address to them under date of 7th Fructidor; and they regret that they have not been able to consider those propositions in the light they are presented by the French ministers, as connecting the justice of indemnity with a beneficial modification of the treaties.

The third and fourth propositions leave it optional with France to reject indemnities, while they secure to her, unconditionally, the treaty of commerce, with a minute exception, which is so limited by time and other circumstances as to render it of little consideration with either party. With respect to the other treaty, the option to reject indemnities produces no effect whatever; its inconveniences are only to be avoided by a purchase of ten millions; so that, by those propositions, indemnities may be sacrificed, and the treaties remain recognized and confirmed—a measure which, in its operation, would be a complete departure from the principle proposed as the basis of negotiation by the French ministers, and the abandonment of an object to which the American ministers are bound to adhere, and upon which their sentiments have never varied.

As to the fifth proposition, it is rendered inadmissible only by an augmentation of the sums proposed by the undersigned ministers, to extinguish the right of France under the mutual guaranty—a right, indeed, which, if France ever placed a value upon, she must have long since discerned that the abolition of it had become as essential to her interests as to those of the nation which she wishes not to embarrass. Confidently was it presumed by the American ministers, that, in the equivalent for that right offered by them, there would be seen a liberal regard to the honor of the French republic, and a still further proof of that desire which has so much sought to facilitate to her an adjustment of existing differences.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, having exhausted their efforts to discover, by a spirit of justice and accommodation, the means of accomplishing the desires and realizing the views of both nations, can only now hope to avail themselves of the better directed efforts of the ministers plenipotentiary, with whom they have the honor to treat.

The American ministers, willing to profit even of suggestions, remark that, in a late conference, which respected as well their note of the 20th of the present month as that of the French ministers plenipotentiary of the 7th Fructidor, it was suggested by one of the latter (though not officially, or as a matter upon which the sense of his colleagues had been taken) that the option contained in the first mentioned note, to extinguish, by an equivalent of eight millions of francs, certain claims of France under the former treaties, ought to be reciprocal; so that, if the offer should be made by either party, the other should accept it. That principle, if reduced to a form proper to give it effect, it is conceived, would be expressed as follows, viz:

If the United States shall, at any time, within seven years from the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, offer to the French republic an article of the tenor following, viz:

"It is agreed that the United States shall pay to the French republic, within seven years from the day of exchanging the ratifications of the treaty of ———, eight millions of francs, in money, or such securities as have been or may be issued to citizens of the United States for indemnities under the said treaty, together with interest hereafter, at the rate of —— per centum per annum, until the principal shall be discharged; and that, as a consideration of such engagement, the United States shall forever be exonerated of the obligation on their part to furnish succors or aid under the mutual guaranty of the 11th article of the treaty of alliance of the 6th of February, 1778; and the rights of the French republic, under the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty of amity and commerce, of the same date, shall be forever limited to such as the most favored nation shall in these respects enjoy:"

The French republic will accept the same; or, if the French republic shall, at any time within that term, offer such an article, the United States will accept the same; and, in either case, the article so offered shall become part of the present treaty.

To such a stipulation, in connexion with the first, fourth, fifth, and sixth propositions offered by the American envoys in their note of the 20th of the present month, they would agree, so great is their desire to terminate, without further loss of time, the present negotiation. They pray the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic to accept the assurances of their high consideration.

SEPTEMBER 5.

The following propositions were delivered by Mr. Rœderer:

PARIS, le 17 Fructidor, an 8.

Pour Messieurs les Ministres Plénipotentiaires des Etats Unis d'Amérique à Paris.

Nous aurons le droit d'amener nos prises dans les ports d'Amérique.

Une commission réglera les indemnités dues par chacune des deux nations aux citoyens de l'autre.

Les indemnités qui seront dues par la France aux citoyens des Etats Unis seront acquittées par les Etats Unis; et, en compensation, la France fait l'abandon du privilége exclusif résultant des articles XVII et XXII du traité de commerce, et des droits de garantie résultant de l'article XI du traité d'alliance.

C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

PARIS, 17*th Fructidor*, (4*th September*,) year 8.

To the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Paris.

We shall have the right to carry our prizes into the American ports.

A commission shall regulate the indemnities due by each of the two nations to the citizens of the other.

The indemnities which shall be found due by France to the citizens of the United States shall be discharged by the United States; and, as an equivalent, France makes an abandonment of the exclusive privilege resulting from articles XVII and XXII of the treaty of commerce, and of the rights of guaranty resulting from the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance.

BONAPARTE.
C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

Mr. Rœderer delivered, at the same time, a paper unsigned, containing the following observations:

The ministers of the United States appear to have mistaken the sense of the last note of the French ministers. They imagine that the indemnities may be sacrificed by the propositions of the 7th Fructidor, and the treaties notwithstanding remain completely acknowledged and confirmed. It has always been the intention of the ministers of France to reserve to her the right of choice between the restoration of her privileges and the payment of indemnities which may be brought against her; so that they have never supposed that she would enjoy privileges without the payment of indemnities, or could pay indemnities without the enjoyment of privileges.

The American ministers have also misunderstood the private observations of one of the French ministers. Their sole object was to show that, during the terms of seven years, France should possess (agreeably even to the plan of the ministers of the United States) the right to choose between the re-establishment of the privileges resulting from the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of commerce, and a sum of at least eight millions, since France regards those privileges as an advantage peculiar to her, and for the abandonment of which she may stipulate as she deems proper.

To avoid the uncertainty which might arise from such a stipulation, hastily reduced to a diplomatic style, the ministers of France have offered anew a naked draft of their final determination; and they observe that, if the American ministers agree to the substance of the note, they may settle the form of it in concert with the French ministers, and even modify the means of arriving at the same end.

SEPTEMBER 6.

The American ministers being unanimous in the opinion that they could not accede to the propositions under date of the 17th Fructidor, agreed to offer the following articles as the basis of negotiation, and as predicated upon the original overtures of the French ministers, referring only the determination of the question respecting the treaties and indemnities to the American Government, and postponing that determination no longer than to the time of ratification:

For the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PARIS, Sept. 6, 1800.

The American ministers consider the propositions received from the ministers plenipotentiary of France yesterday, under date of the 17th Fructidor, as altogether inadmissible. The nearest approach to them, which the American ministers can make, is,

1. The former treaties shall be renewed and confirmed.

2. The obligations of the guaranty shall be specified and limited, as in the first paragraph of their third proposition of the 20th of August.

3. There shall be mutual indemnities, and a mutual restoration of captured property not yet definitively condemned, according to their fifth and sixth propositions of that date.

4. If, at the exchange of ratifications, the United States shall propose a mutual relinquishment of indemnities, the French republic will agree to the same; and, in such case, the former treaties shall not be deemed obligatory except that under the 17th and 22d articles of that of commerce, the parties shall continue forever to have for their public ships of war, privateers, and prizes, such privileges in the ports of each other as the most favored nation shall enjoy.

O. ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

SEPTEMBER 8.

The above note was sent on the same day to the French ministers; no answer, however, being yet received, the following note requesting an interview was sent to-day:

To the Ministers Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

PARIS, September 8, 1800.

The envoys of the United States request the honor of an interview with the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, at such place as may be convenient to them, in order to learn whether the note of the undersigned of the 6th of the present month can serve as the basis of a treaty, or, if not, whether any further overtures are to be expected on the part of France. They pray the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic to accept the assurances of their high consideration.

O. ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

SEPTEMBER 9.

Mr. Rœderer informed the American ministers that the conference requested could not take place, owing to the absence of Joseph Bonaparte, the president of the commission.

SEPTEMBER 11.

The following note was received:

PARIS, le 24 Fructidor, an 8.

Demain, à deux heures après midi, les ministres plénipotentiaires de la république Française auront l'honneur de se rendre chez Messieurs les envoyés extraordinaires des Etats Unis d'Amérique, Hotel des Oiseaux.

Je les prie de vouloir bien agréer l'assurance de ma haute considération.

J. BONAPARTE.

PARIS, 24*th Fructidor*, (September 11,) year 8.

The ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic will do themselves the honor to meet the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, at their residence, Hotel des Oiseaux, to-morrow, at two o'clock P. M.

I pray them to accept the assurance of my high consideration.

J. BONAPARTE.

SEPTEMBER 12.

The American ministers met this morning to settle the mode of conducting the expected conference, and resolved to press their last propositions to the utmost; and if the French ministers should finally disagree to them, without offering any admissible substitute, then, in that case, to offer the written proposition delivered by Mr. Rœderer on the 26th of August, in two forms, one connecting the 11th article of the treaty of alliance with the 22d and 17th of that of amity and commerce, in the option of an equivalent; the other pursuing strictly the original proposition, but connecting it with a modification of the guaranty. Some remarks were also prepared with respect to the operation and effect of a guaranty in the form of the 11th article, it being the object of the American ministers to discuss the business fully, and, if possible, to press it to a termination.

The French ministers attended at the hour appointed, and the propositions of the 6th of September were taken up and considered, article by article. The 1st and 3d were agreed to, with some modification of the 3d, as to rules of evidence, which did not vary its principle. The 2d and 4th were considered together, as in some measure connected; and, after considerable discussion, the French ministers said they were determined not to accede to these, unless an option, perfectly similar and reciprocal, was assured to the French republic, the operation of which enabled her to get rid of the indemnities, by an offer of abandoning the exclusive privileges. They now openly avowed that their real object was to avoid, by every means, any engagement to pay indemnities, giving as one reason the utter inability of France to pay, in the situation in which she would be left by the present war. The subject of the modification of the guaranty was now particularly pressed in the manner agreed. The conversation on this subject closed by a declaration of the president of the French commission, that such a modification could not be acceded to without new instructions; that they had no powers to assent to such a stipulation; but that, if the Government should think proper to instruct them to make a treaty on the basis of indemnities and a modified renewal of the old treaties, he would resign sooner than sign such a treaty; adding that, if the question could be determined by an indifferent nation, he was satisfied such a tribunal would say that the present state of things was war on the side of America, and that no indemnities could be claimed. The other two commissioners made similar declarations.

The American ministers retired a few minutes and agreed that it was now clearly in vain to make any further attempts on this ground, and, of course, useless to bring forward the proposition of Mr. Rœderer in any form.

The conference was, therefore, closed by the American ministers requesting a written answer to the note of the 6th of September.

Reflections of the American ministers on their overture respecting the guaranty delivered to the French ministers, at their conference, on the 12*th day of September.*

Adopting the universality of modern practice as a rule of exposition, a guaranty which omits to stipulate specific succors does not contemplate any to be furnished, and is only, on the part of the guarantor, a renunciation of interfering claims, an engagement not to countenance or admit such claims in favor of a third Power, and, generally, an assurance of good offices for the security of the object guarantied, which shall not be onerous to himself.

If, however, the guaranty between France and the United States did in fact contemplate succors, they must have been principally for the latter, who might need them, rather than for the former, who was evidently competent to protect herself; and the mutuality of the obligation to succor could have been intended for little more than to save appearances.

Again, if the ability to furnish succors was to be the measure of them, (and if they were contemplated at all, there could have been no other measure,) much less must have been expected from the scattered agriculturists of a new country than from a nation habitually prepared for war, and one of the most powerful in Europe.

The American ministers, however, have proposed, not only to render the guaranty specific, but to render the succors equal, and that without taking into the account that France will frequently receive, and but seldom have occasion to furnish them. Their offer, it is presumed, in the view of the subject here given, will be sufficiently appreciated. The French ministers will see in this proposition only those motives of liberal policy, and that sincere spirit of accommodation which have continually actuated the United States towards France; there being no circumstance in the present juncture that would dictate a sacrifice to that object of their convenience or their interests, and nothing in the perspective of the future from which they might augur such a necessity. And the American ministers presume that France will not raise new obstacles to the progress of the negotiation, by placing a high and unexpected value upon what she really placed none heretofore: it would accord neither with her accustomed magnanimity, nor that conciliatory policy towards the United States which she professes to pursue.

SEPTEMBER 12.

The following note was received from the French ministers:

PARIS, 26 Fructidor, an 8.

Les ministres de France ne peuvent se départir des modifications qu'ils ont eu l'honneur de proposer hier verbalement à Messieurs les ministres Américains sur leur note du 6 de Septembre, (19 Fructidor.) Ils sont fixés à ces principes:

1. Qu'une stipulation d'indemnités emporte avec elle la reconnaissance pleine et entière des traités; et

2. Que l'abandon des avantages et priviléges stipulés par les traités, moyennant l'abandon réciproque des indemnités, serait l'arrangement le plus utile et le plus honorable des deux nations.

Partant de ces principes, les ministres Français persistent dans les déclarations verbales qu'ils ont faites dans la conférence d'hier. En conséquence, ils vont s'expliquer sur chacun des articles de la note du 6 Septembre.

1. Les anciens traités seront reconnus et confirmés.

Ils accèdent à la proposition de l'article I.

2. Les obligations de garantie seront specifiées et limitées comme dans le premier paragraphe de leur 3ème proposition du 20 d'Août.

Le second ne peut être admis à moins que l'article IV. ne donne à la république Française l'assurance, que si elle propose aux Etats Unis l'abandon réciproque des indemnités, cette proposition sera acceptée moyennant l'abandon du droit de garantie résultant du traité d'alliance, et des priviléges résultants des articles XVII et XXII du traité de commerce. Si l'article IV ne porte cette stipulation, ni cet article IV ni l'article II ne peut être admis.

"3. Il y aura des indemnités mutuelles, et une restitution réciproque des propriétés capturées, qui ne seront pas encore définitivement jugées, d'apres leur 5ème et 6ème propositions de la même date."

L'article III a paru exiger quelques explications. Les ministres de France entendent:

1. Qu'il sera réglé des indemnités pour les prises faites sur des particuliers, et qui auront été jugées à l'époque de la signature du traité.

2. Que les vaisseaux et bâtimens nationaux pris respectivement seront restitués ou payés.

3. Que les prises faites sur les particuliers, et non jugées à l'époque de la signature du traité, seront jugées d'après le traité de 1778, sainement interprété ainsi qu'il sera convenu.

L'article IV ne peut-être admis, ainsi qu'on l'a déjà observé, s'il n'offre à la France le même droit qu'aux Etats Unis, et s'il ne maintient les traités anciens à l'exception de l'engagement de garantie et des priviléges.

Pour remplir cet objet, et valider l'article II, l'article IV devrait etre conçu en ces termes, ou autres équivalens.

"Si à l'échange des ratifications, les Etats Unis offrent à la république Française, ou si la république Française offre aux Etats Unis l'abandon réciproque des indemnités, cette proposition sera acceptée; et, en ce cas, l'engagement de garantie résultant de l'article XI du traité d'alliance, et des priviléges résultants des articles XVII et XXII du traité de commerce, seront réduits aux avantages dont pourrait jouir la nation la plus favorisée.

C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, 26 Fructidor, (13th September,) year 8.

The ministers of France are unable to depart from the modifications which they had yesterday the honor to propose verbally to the American ministers, on the subject of their note of the 6th of September, (19th Fructidor.) They adhere to these principles:

1. That a stipulation of indemnities carries with it a full and entire recognition of the treaties: and

2. That the abandonment of the advantages and privileges stipulated by the treaties, in consideration of the reciprocal abandonment of indemnities, will be the most useful and honorable arrangement for both nations.

Acting on these principles, the French ministers persist in the verbal declarations made at the conference yesterday. They will, therefore, proceed to give some explanations on each of the articles of the note of the 6th of September.

1. The ancient treaties shall be recognized and confirmed.

They accede to the proposition contained in the first article.

2. The obligations of the guaranty shall be specified and limited, as in the first paragraph of their third proposition of the 20th of August.

The second cannot be admitted unless the fourth article shall give to the French republic the assurance that, if she should propose to the United States the reciprocal abandonment of indemnities, this proposition will be accepted, in consideration of the abandonment of the right of guaranty, resulting from the treaty of alliance, and of the privileges resulting from the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty of commerce. If article IV does not carry with it this stipulation, neither article IV nor article II can be admitted.

3. There shall be mutual indemnities, and a mutual restoration of captured property, not yet definitively condemned, according to the fifth and sixth propositions of that date.

The third has appeared to require some explanations. The ministers of France understand:—

1. Indemnities shall be provided for captures made from individuals, and which shall have been condemned at the time of signing the treaty.

2. That the vessels and national ships, respectively taken, shall be restored or paid for.

3. That the captures made from individuals, and not adjudicated at the time of signing the treaty, shall be adjudicated according to the treaty of 1778, correctly interpreted, as may be agreed on.

4. If, at the exchange of ratifications, the United States shall propose a reciprocal abandonment of indemnities, the French republic will agree to this proposition; and, in this case, the ancient treaties shall not be deemed obligatory; except that, under the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty of commerce, the parties shall continue to have, for their vessels of war, privateers, and prizes, in their respective ports, the privileges enjoyed by the most favored nation.

Article IV cannot be admitted, as has already been observed, if it does not offer the same rights to France as to the United States; and if it does not preserve the ancient treaties, with the exception of the privileges, and the stipulation of guaranty.

In order to attain this object, and render the 2d article admissible, the 4th article should be expressed in the following, or some other equivalent terms: "If, at the exchange of ratifications, the United States shall offer to the French republic, or if the French republic shall offer to the United States, the reciprocal abandonment of indemnities, this proposition will be accepted; and, in this case, the engagement of guaranty resulting from the 11th article of the treaty of alliance, and the privileges resulting from articles XI and XXII of the treaty of commerce shall be restricted to the advantages which can be enjoyed by the most favored nation.

J. BONAPARTE,
C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

SEPTEMBER 13.

The American ministers being now convinced that the door was perfectly closed against all hope of obtaining indemnities, with any modification of the treaties, it only remained to be determined whether, under all circumstances, it would not be expedient to attempt a temporary arrangement which would extricate the United States from the war, or that peculiar state of hostility in which they are at present involved, save the immense property of our citizens now depending before the council of prizes, and secure, as far as possible, our commerce against the abuses of captures during the present war.

After mature deliberation, the American ministers resolved to make the overture contained in the following note, which was sent to the commissioners of the French republic the same day:

PARIS, 13*th September*, 1800.

The Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French republic.

The undersigned had the honor of receiving the note of the French ministers of the 26 Fructidor yesterday.

The discussion of former treaties and of indemnities, being for the present closed, it must, of course, be postponed till it can be resumed with fewer embarrassments.

It remains only to consider the expediency of a temporary arrangement. Should such an arrangement comport with the views of France, the following principles are offered as the basis of it.

1. The ministers plenipotentiary of the respective parties, not being able at present to agree respecting the former treaties and indemnities, the parties will in due and convenient time further treat on those subjects; and, until they shall have agreed respecting the same, the said treaties shall have no operation. In the meantime,

2. The parties shall abstain from all unfriendly acts; their commercial intercourse shall be free, and debts shall be recoverable in the same manner as if no misunderstanding had intervened.

3. Property captured and not yet definitively condemned, or which may be captured before the exchange of ratifications, shall be mutually restored. Proofs of ownership to be specified in the convention.

4. Some provisional regulations shall be made to prevent abuses and disputes that may arise out of future cases of capture.

The ministers of the United States request the honor of an early interview at such time and place as may be convenient to the ministers plenipotentiary of the French republic, and offer them the assurances of their high consideration.

O. ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

SEPTEMBER 19.

A conference was held to day with the French ministers, at the opening of which they delivered the following articles as a kind of counterproject:

PARIS, 2 Complémentaire, an 8.

Les ministres de France et ceux des Etats Unis ayant reconnu à la suite de discussions multipliées qu'ils ne pouvaient en ce moment s'accorder sur l'interpretation des articles XI du traité d'alliance, XVII et XXII du traité de commerce de 1778, non plus que sur les indemnités réciproques qui peuvent être dues pour raison des prises faites sur les particuliers des deux nations, sont convenues de ce qui suit:

ART. 1. Les parties remettent à un autre tems la discussion des indemnités, et des trois articles ci-dessus des traités de 1778; lesquels traités sont au reste reconnus et confirmés par les présents, ainsi que la convention consulaire de 1788.

ART. 2. Les vaisseaux des deux nations et leurs corsaires, accompagnés de leur prises, seront traités dans les ports respectifs comme ceux de la nation la plus favorisée.

ART. 3. Les bâtimens d'état seront rendus ou payés.

ART. 4. Les propriétés particulières non encore jugées, le seront d'après le traité d'amitié et de commerce de 1778; en conséquence, il ne sera point exigé de rôle d'équipage, ni aucune autre preuve que ce traité n'exigerait pas.

FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, 2 Complémentaire, (19th September,) year 8.

The ministers of France and those of the United States, finding, at the close of numerous discussions, that they cannot agree, at this time, either respecting the interpretation of the 11th article of the treaty of alliance of 1778, and the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty of commerce of the same year, or on the subject of the reciprocal indemnities due in consequence of the captures made from the citizens of the two nations, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The two parties defer to another time the discussion of the indemnities, and of the abovementioned articles of the treaties of 1778: in every other particular, these treaties are, by these presents, recognized and confirmed, as well as the consular convention of 1788.

ART. 2. The vessels and the privateers, with their prizes, of the two nations, shall be treated, in their respective ports, as those of the most favored nation.

ART. 3. The public ships shall either be restored or paid for.

ART. 4. The property of individuals, not yet condemned, shall be adjudicated according to the treaty of friendship and commerce of 1778; in consequence of which, no rôle d'équipage shall be required, nor any other proof which is not required by that treaty.

C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

These articles were discussed, with the corresponding articles in the propositions of the American ministers of the 13th of September; and it was agreed to meet from day to day until the business was finished.

SEPTEMBER 24.

The following note was received from the Secretary of the French Legation:

4th COMPLEMENTAIRE, (Sept. 21) year 8.

Mr. Pichon's compliments to Messrs. Davie and Ellsworth, and sends to them, herewith enclosed, copies of the articles settled. Mr. P. has it in charge from the French ministers to desire the American envoys, if they see no impropriety, to communicate what they intend to propose further on the fourth principle of the note, in order that the French ministers may look to it until the next conference, and that the debates after dinner may be the shorter.

If the American ministers have no objection to this, and they are pleased to forward the articles to Mr. Pichon, he will translate and communicate them to the French ministers, so that time may be spared, and business, as much as possible, forwarded.

SEPTEMBER 22.

The American ministers present their compliments to Mr. Pichon, and readily comply with the proposal in his obliging note of yesterday.

They will bring forward, as details under their fourth proposition, the 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 28th articles of their former project, with some variation of the 22d and 23d to adapt them to principles already agreed on. These articles, it is presumed, cannot occupy much time, as they have been so long in the hands of the French ministers, as they are principally drawn from the treaty of '78, and are only varied or enlarged to prevent a repetition of abuses and misunderstandings. It will also be proposed to add to the 24th, the following clause: "Nevertheless, it shall not be required to examine the papers of vessels convoyed by vessels of war, but credence shall be given to the word of the officer who shall conduct the convoy;" principally with a view to check West India privateers, till your Government shall be able to reduce them to obedience.

The American ministers present their compliments to Mr. Pichon, and now send, agreeably to his request, the 23d article of their former project, varied agreeably to the intimation given in their note to him of yesterday. He will have the goodness to present the article to the French ministers for their examination. It accommodates their views to subject enemy goods in free bottoms as soon after the ratifications as papers can be furnished, requisite to prevent great embarrassments. It concedes the principle they desire, while it so regulates the exercise of that principle as to render it less distressing to neutral commerce, and, of course, less injurious to France.

SEPTEMBER 23.

ART. 23. And that captures on light suspicions may be avoided, and injuries thence arising prevented, it is agreed that, when one party shall be engaged in war, and the other party be neuter, the ships of the neutral party, that is, such of them as have already left, or which, prior to the 1st day of May next, may leave, the ports of the nation to which they belong, shall be furnished with passports similar to those described in the article, that it may appear thereby that the ships really belong to the citizens of the neutral party. They shall be valid for any number of voyages, but shall be recalled every year, that is, if the ship should return home within the space of a year. Such ships, being laden, are to be provided not only with passports as abovementioned, but also with certificates similar to those described in the same article, that so it may be known whether they carry any contraband goods. No other paper shall be required, any usage or ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding. And if it shall not appear, from said certificates, that there are contraband goods on board, the ships shall be permitted to proceed on their voyage: if it shall appear from the certificates that there are contraband goods on board any such ship, and the commander of the same shall offer to deliver them up, he shall, notwithstanding, be at liberty to proceed on his voyage, unless the quantity of the contraband goods shall be greater than can be conveniently received on board the ship of war, or privateer; in which case, the ship may be carried into port for the delivery of the same.

With respect to ships which shall leave the ports of the nation to which they belong after the last day of April next, they shall be furnished with passports as abovementioned, and, if laden, shall be furnished with like certificates as beforementioned, excepting that the certificates shall also express to whom the cargo belongs, and of what nation, state, or Prince the owner is a citizen or subject, that so it may be known if there are contraband or enemy goods on board. No other paper shall be required, any usage or ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding. And if it shall not appear from the last mentioned certificates that there are either contraband or enemy goods on board, the ships shall be permitted to proceed on their voyage: if it shall appear from the certificates that there are contraband or enemy goods on board any such ship, and the commander of the same shall offer to deliver them up, he shall, notwithstanding, be at liberty to proceed on his voyage, unless the quantity of contraband or enemy goods, or of both, be greater than can be conveniently received on board of the ship of war or privateer; in which case, he may be carried into port for the delivery of the same.

If any ship in the predicament first above mentioned shall not be furnished with such passport and certificates as is above required for the same, such case may be examined by a proper judge or tribunal; and, if it shall be found, from other documents or proofs admissible by the usage of nations, that the ship belongs to the citizens of the neutral party, it shall not be confiscated, but shall be released, with her cargo, (contraband goods excepted,) and be permitted to proceed on her voyage. And, if any ship in the second predicament above mentioned shall not be furnished with such passport and certificates as is above required for the same, such case may be examined by a proper judge or tribunal; and, if it shall be found, from other documents or proofs admissible by the usage of nations, that the ship belongs to the citizens of the neutral party, the same shall not be confiscated, but shall be released, with her cargo, (contraband goods and such as shall be found to be enemy goods excepted,) and be permitted to proceed on her voyage.

The business was now conducted by conference, from day to day, until the 30th of September, when the convention was finished, under the title of a "provisional treaty." The French ministers had insisted that the treaty should be signed, under a recognition that the original was in the French language, after the manner of the treaty of '78. As the American ministers refused to acknowledge this as a precedent, or recognize any prerogative with respect to language, the French ministers this evening delivered the following note on that subject:

PARIS, le 8 Vendemiaire, an 9.

Les ministres de France demandent, rélativement au traité, de trois choses; l'une:

Ou qu'il soit signé uniquement en langue Française, et sans reserve, comme la convention consulaire de la France avec les Etats Unis de 1788, et le traité de la France avec l'Angleterre de 1786;

Ou qu'il soit signé uniquement en langue Française, et qu'un article séparé stipule, comme à la suite du traité de 1783 entre la France et l'Angleterre, "que la langue Française employée dans ce traité ne pourra tirer à conséquence ni préjudicier à l'une ni à l'autre des parties contractantes;"

Ou, enfin, qu'il soit signé en langue Française et en langue Anglaise, avec la reconnaissance exprimée à la fin du traité d'alliance et du traité de commerce de 1778, ainsi qu'il suit: C'en foi de quoi, les plénipotentiaires respectifs ont signés les articles ci-dessus, tant en langue Française qu'en langue Anglaise, déclarant, néanmoins, que le présent traité a été originairement rédigé et arrêté en langue Française.

Les ministres de France ne peuvent s'écarter de l'une ou de l'autre de ces formes, ou d'une equivalente, par où il apparaisse que la négociation a été suivie en Français, et que l'original du traité est en cette langue. Leurs raisons sont péremptoires:

La 1ère. C'est que tel est l'usage entre la France et l'Amérique, entre la France et l'Angleterre, entre la France et plusieurs autres états, même entre l'Amérique et d'autres états que la France.

La 2ème. C'est que le principe n'a rien de contraire à l'égalité des deux nations, et que l'usage d'une langue quelconque dans un traité commun à plusieurs parties est un avantage commun à ces parties, sans être un privilége pour la nation qui parle le plus habituellement cette langue.

Ces deux propositions peuvent avoir besoin de quelque développement.

Sur la première, nous nous bornons à ajouter aux exemples cités des deux traités de 1778, et de la convention consulaire de 1788, passée entre la France et l'Amérique, que les Etats Unis se sont servis de la langue Française, sans réclamation et sans réserve, dans des traités où la France n'etait pour rien. Tel est le traité d'amitié et de commerce fait à Paris entre les Etats Unis et la Suède le 3ème Avril, 1783. Nous nous bornerons à demander pourquoi la langue Française, ayant été la langue originale des traités faits par les Etats Unis avec la France et la Suède, elle cesserait tout-à-coup de l'être?

La deuxième proposition s'établit sur des notions fort simples:

1. Quand deux nations, ainsi que deux particuliers, ont des différends à régler ensemble, il est naturel qu'ils s'expliquent dans une langue commune, tant pour éviter la longueur et l'inexactitude des interpretations, que pour ne pas ajouter à la mésintelligence née de la nature des choses la mésintelligence des mots.

Quand il s'agit de négociations ouvertes entre trois, quatre, ou cinq nations différentes, qui parlent chacune une langue différente, la necessité d'une langue commune est encore plus sensible.

Lorsque l'Europe n'avait pour langue commune que le Latin, les traités se fesaient en Latin; depuis que la langue Française, issue du Latin, est devenue une langue classique, il a été généralement jugé plus commode de l'employer que le Latin, et elle a été substituée au Latin. Alors la langue Française a acquis, si l'on veut, un privilége sur les autres langues, mais non la nation Française; et ce privilége elle l'a acquis aux dépens du Latin, non d'aucune autre langue vivante, non au préjudice des droits d'aucune autre nation. Les nations, en la reconnaissant pour l'héritière de la langue Latine en l'adoptant à la place de celle-ci, n'ont fait que ce qui leur etoit le plus commode, pour l'exposition, la discussion, et l'expression de leurs droits, elles ont consideré et servi leurs droits, au lieu d'y préjudicier.

2. Quand deux ou un plus grand nombre de parties ont négocié entre elles en une langue, il est possible de convenir que le traité sera translaté dans la langue de chacune des parties, et signé par toutes les autres; mais, en ce cas, le bon sens et l'intérêt commun demandent deux choses: la première, qu'un des exemplaires, signé aussi par toutes les parties contractantes, soit reconnu pour l'exemplaire original; et la deuxième, qu'on déclare exemplaire original celui qui est rédigé dans la langue de la négociation.

Il faut disons nous, d'abord, qu'il y ait un exemplaire original; parceque si le tems et l'usage, ce qui est inevitable, (ce qui est arrivé relativement au traité d'amitié et de commerce de 1778) font reconnaître dans les expressions de deux exemplaires en langue différentes des différences d'abord inapperçues, il est nécessaire de recourir à une version commune.

Nous disons, en second lieu, que l'exemplaire auquel doit être attaché le titre d'original est l'examplaire rédigé dans la langue de la négociation, et les raisons en sont évidentes. C'est, 1er, que de fait cet exemplaire est l'original des autres qui a été composé le premier, article par article, dans la langue de la négociation, et à mesure que la négociation a fait des progrès.

2d. C'est qu'en cas de discordance entre une locution insérée dans un exemplaire du traité en la locution d'un autre dans une langue différente, la raison, la justice, disent à tous les contractans de recourir à l'expression convenue et avouée par tout dans la langue de la négociation, puisque ce n'est pour chacun que revenir à l'expression première de sa propre volonté, et au tableau fidel de ses propres intentions. Il faut, donc, regarder toute idée de prérogative nationale comme étrangère à l'adoption de la langue Française pour langue originale du traité. Rien ne sollicite, donc, des ministres Américains une innovation; rien n'autoriserait, donc, les ministres Français à se départir de l'usage.

C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, 8th Vendemiaire, (29th September,) year 8.

The ministers of France insist, in relation to the treaty, upon one of three things:

Either that the treaty shall be signed in the French language only, without any reservation, the mode pursued by the consular convention of 1788, between France and the United States, and by the treaty of 1786, between France and England;

Or, that it shall be signed in the French language only; and that a separate article (similar to the one at the close of the treaty of 1783, between France and England,) shall stipulate, "That the French language, used in this treaty, shall not constitute a precedent, nor operate to the prejudice of either of the contracting parties;"

Or, finally, that it shall be signed in the French and English languages, accompanied by the following declaration, conforming to the one at the end of the treaty of alliance and the treaty of commerce of 1778: "In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the above articles, both in the French and English languages; declaring, nevertheless, that the present treaty was originally written and concluded in the French language."

The ministers of France cannot depart from either the one or the other of these forms, or from one by which it will appear, with equal clearness, that the negotiation has been conducted in French, and that the original treaty is in that language. Their reasons are conclusive.

The first is, that this has been the usage between France and America, between France and England, between France and many other states, and even between America and other states besides France.

The second is, that this usage involves no principle opposed to the equality of the two nations; and that the use of one language, whatever that may be, in a treaty common to several parties, is a mutual advantage, and ought not to be considered as a privilege conferred on the nation to whom the adopted language is most familiar.

These two propositions may require a few words in explanation. On the first, we will only observe that, in addition to the cited examples of the two treaties of 1778, between France and America, and the consular convention of 1788, the United States have used the French language, without hesitation or objection, in treaties with which France had no concern. The treaty of friendship and commerce between the United States and Sweden, concluded at Paris, the 3d of April, 1783, may be referred to as an instance. May it not be asked, why should the French language be now rejected, after having been adopted as the original in treaties formed by the United States with both France and Sweden?

The second proposition is founded upon very obvious considerations.

1st. When two nations or individuals are desirous of terminating differences existing between them, it is natural that they should make their several explanations in a common language, as well for the purpose of avoiding the tediousness and incorrectness of interpretations, as of preventing an increased misunderstanding which might arise from verbal misconstruction.

When public negotiations are carried on between three, four, or five different nations, speaking different languages, the necessity of a common language becomes the more apparent.

Formerly, when Europe had no common language except the Latin, treaties were formed in that language. But since the French, a derivation from the Latin, has become a classical language, it has generally been considered more convenient than the Latin for general use, and has therefore been substituted for the Latin. Hence, the French language has acquired a privilege, if you please, over other languages, but not the French nation. It has acquired this privilege at the expense of the Latin, not of any living language, and still less in prejudice of the rights of any Power whatever. Nations, in acknowledging it as the legitimate successor of the Latin, and in adopting it as their own, have only had recourse to a practice the most convenient to themselves in the exposition, discussion, and expression of their rights; and have thus advanced those rights by yielding up their prejudices.

2d. When two or more parties have been carrying on a negotiation in one language, it is possible to agree that the treaty shall be translated in the language of each of the parties, and signed by all. But, in this case, good sense and common interest require two things: First, that one of the copies, thus signed by all the contracting parties, should be acknowledged as the original: Secondly, that the copy written in the language in which the negotiation was conducted should be regarded as that original.

We say, in the first place, that there must be one original copy. Because, if time and usage should disclose differences of expression, at first unperceived, in the phraseology employed in two copies, written in different languages, (a circumstance which seems inevitable, and has, indeed, occurred in relation to the treaty of friendship and commerce of 1778,) it will be necessary to have recourse to a common version.

We say, in the second place, that the copy, written in the language in which the negotiation was conducted, is the one to which the title of original should be given. The reasons are evident: First, in point of fact, it is the original, as it respects the rest, having been first composed, article by article, in the language of the negotiation, as the negotiation itself progressed: Secondly, in the event of a discrepancy in expression between two copies of the same treaty, written in different languages, it is the dictate of reason and justice that the contracting parties should have recourse to that expression which was agreed upon and avowed by all, in the language of the negotiation. What is more reasonable than that each should refer to the first expression of his own will, and the faithful signs of his own intentions?

In the adoption, therefore, of the French, as the original language of the treaty, every idea of national prerogative should be discarded, as foreign to the subject. No innovation is urged upon the American ministers, and no consideration can authorize the ministers of France to depart from established usage.

C. P. CLARET FLEURIEU,
RŒDERER.

The American ministers finally, but with great reluctance, agreed to the signing in the form of the treaty of 1778, and it was executed accordingly.

OCTOBER 2.

The French ministers called this morning with the treaties, proposing some alterations, with regard to the style of the French republic, and that the word "provisional" should be stricken out in the name or description of the treaty. The American ministers availed themselves of this opportunity to resume their opposition to the admission in favor of the French language, and consented to the proposed alterations, respecting the style of the French Government, and offered to change the term "provisional treaty" for that of "convention," on the condition that that part of the treaty which respected the French language was stricken out, agreeing, at the same time, that a clause might be inserted, saving the right of both nations; to which the French ministers acceded without any further discussion.

OCTOBER 3.

Six copies being now prepared, as agreed to be amended, they were signed and sealed under the former date of the 30th of September, (9 Vendemiaire;) two copies were retained by the French commissioners, two were left with Mr. Murray, and the other two were taken in charge by Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Davie.

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
W. R. DAVIE,
W. V. MURRAY.

PARIS, October 4, 1800.

SIR:

The undersigned have the honor to present to you a journal of their proceedings, and a convention in which those proceedings have terminated.

The claim of indemnities brought forward by them was, early in the negotiation, connected by the French ministers with that of a restoration of treaties, for the infractions of which the indemnities were principally claimed. To obviate this embarrassment, which it had not been difficult to foresee, the American ministers urged, in the spirit of their instructions, that those treaties having been violated by one party, and renounced by the other, a priority had attached in favor of the treaty with Great Britain, who had thereby acquired an exclusive right for the introduction of prizes; wherefore, that right could not be restored to France. The argument was pressed, both by notes and in conferences, as long as there remained a hope of its utility, and until there appeared no alternative but to abandon indemnities, or, as a means of saving them, to renew, at least partially, the treaty of commerce. Whether, in fact, it could or could not be renewed consistently with good faith, then became a question for thorough investigation; in the course of which, the following considerations occurred:

1st. It is not a breach of faith to form a treaty with one nation inconsistent with an existing treaty with another; it being well understood that the prior treaty prevails, and has the same operation as if the subsequent one were not formed; nor is it necessary or usual for a subsequent to make an express saving of the rights of a prior treaty, the law of nations having made that saving as complete and effectual as it can be rendered. This rule of construction holds universally, except where the subsequent treaty can have no operation but by violating the first; in which case, it will be taken for an agreement to come to a rupture with the Power with whom the first was formed.

2d. Indeed, by a clause in the twenty-fifth article of the British treaty, it is provided, "that while the parties continue in amity, neither of them will in future make any treaty that shall be inconsistent with that or the preceding article," which articles contain, among other things, the exclusive right of introducing prizes into the ports of each other. If, however, the British be considered in the light of a prior treaty, as it must be to raise a doubt, all its rights, as well those of a restrictive nature as others, would be saved, of course, and none of them would at any time, or in any degree, be affected by the subsequent stipulation. The subsequent stipulation, in the case supposed, although it should give in general terms the right of introducing prizes, would be understood with a limitation, that it was never to extend to a case in which Great Britain should be the enemy.

3d. The instructions to the American ministers authorized a renewal of the seventeenth article of the treaty of commerce, if it should be necessary, though with a special saving for two articles of the British treaty. That special saving, however, cannot be material, as the settled rule of construction would, without it, make a saving still more comprehensive.

4th. The renewal of the seventeenth article of the commercial treaty is not conceived to be within the expression or design of the restraining clause of the British treaty, "not in future to make any treaty that shall be inconsistent with," &c. To recognize a pre-existing treaty which contains a stipulation inconsistent with, &c. is not to make a new or future treaty containing such stipulation. To recognize the former treaties would be only to preserve or restore the state of things existing when the British treaty was formed, and not to introduce a new state of things, which was, doubtless, the event intended to be guarded against. It would be only to do what is usually done in the termination of misunderstandings. We are not to presume, and much less is it expressed, that the United States and Great Britain meant to deprive themselves of the usual means of terminating national contests in which they might be involved. And the facility of terminating misunderstandings, by restoring things to their former condition, is not only so great, but so conformable to justice, and so favorable to general tranquillity, that the law of nations will not favor a construction which goes to deprive a contracting party of the benefit of it.

5th. The language in which pre-existing treaties are usually recognized at the close of a war does not import that the treaties have in fact ceased to exist, but rather that the causes which suspended their operation have ceased. And in various instances such treaties are counted upon as becoming again operative, without any express provision to render them so.

6th. Nor is it conceived, that the treaties between the United States and France have undergone a more nullying operation than the condition of war necessarily imposes. Doubtless, the congressional act, authorizing the reduction of French cruisers by force, was an authorization of war, limited, indeed, in its extent, but not in its nature. Clearly, also, their subsequent act, declaring that the treaties had ceased to be obligatory, however proper it might be for the removal of doubts, was but declaratory of the actual state of things; and certainly it was only from an exercise of the constitutional prerogative of declaring war that either of them derived validity. So that the treaties in question, having had only the usual inoperation, might, without a breach of faith, have the usual recognition.

7th. As far as the opinion of Great Britain goes, there would be no difficulty in recognizing a treaty, which gives to France an exclusive right to introduce prizes into the ports of the United States; because she, by a project of a treaty of peace, drawn up at her own court in 1792, and offered by Lord Malmesbury to the French plenipotentiaries, proposed to give to France such exclusive right in the British ports; that is, the project renewed the treaties of Paris of 1763, and of 1783, both of which renewed the commercial treaty of Utrecht of 1713, which contained such a stipulation.

The foregoing considerations induced the undersigned to be unanimously of the opinion that any part of the former treaties might be renewed consistently with good faith.

They then offered a renewal, with limitations of the seventeeth article of the commercial treaty, which, without compromitting the interests of the United States, would have given to France what her ministers had particularly insisted on, as essential to her honor, and what they had given reason to expect would be deemed satisfactory. The overture, however, finally produced no other effect than to enlarge the demand of the French ministers, from a partial to a total renewal of the treaties; which brought the negotiation a second time to a stand.

The American ministers, however, after a deliberation of some days, the progress of events in Europe continuing in the meantime to grow more unfavorable to their success, made an ulterior advance, going the whole length of what had been last insisted on. They offered an unlimited recognition of the former treaties, though accompanied with a provision to extinguish such privileges claimed under them as were detrimental to the United States, by a pecuniary equivalent, to be made out of the indemnities which should be awarded to American citizens. A compensation, which, though it might have cancelled but a small portion of the indemnities, was, nevertheless, a liberal one for privileges, which the French ministers had often admitted to be of little use to France, under the construction which the American Government had given to the treaties.

This offer, though it covered the avowed objects of the French Government, secured an engagement to pay indemnities, as well as the power to extinguish the obnoxious parts of the treaties. To avoid any engagement of this kind, the French ministers now made an entire departure from the principles upon which the negotiation had proceeded for some time, and resumed the simple unqualified ground of their overture of the 23d Thermidor, declaring that it was indispensable to the granting of indemnities, not only that the treaties should have an unqualified recognition, but that their future operation should not be varied in any particular, for any consideration or compensation whatever. In short, they thought proper to add, what was quite unnecessary, that their real object was to avoid indemnities, and that it was not in the power of France to pay them.

No time was requisite for the American ministers to intimate that it had become useless to pursue the negotiation any further.

It accorded as little with their views as with their instructions, to subject their country perpetually to the mischievous effects of those treaties, in order to obtain a promise of indemnity at a remote period—a promise which might as easily prove delusive as it would reluctantly be made; especially, as under the guaranty of the treaty of alliance, the United States might be immediately called upon for succors, which, if not furnished, would of itself be a sufficient pretext to render abortive the hope of indemnity.

It only remained for the undersigned to quit France, leaving the United States involved in a contest, and, according to appearances, soon alone in a contest, which it might be as difficult for them to relinquish with honor as to pursue with a prospect of advantage; or else to propose a temporary arrangement, reserving for a definitive adjustment points which could not then be satisfactorily settled, and providing in the meantime against a state of things of which neither party could profit. They elected the latter, and the result has been the signature of a convention.

Of property not yet definitively condemned, which the fourth article respects, there are more than forty ships and cargoes, and a number of them of great value, at present pending for decision before the council of prizes; and many others are doubtless in a condition to be brought there, if the claimants shall think fit.

Guards against future abuses are perhaps as well provided as they can be by stipulations.

The article respecting convoys may be of use in the West Indies, till it shall be more in the power of the French Government than it is at present to reduce the corsairs in that quarter to obedience.

As to the article which places French privateers and prizes on the footing of those of the most favored nations, it was inserted as drawn by the French ministers, without any discussion of the extent of its operation; the American ministers having, in former stages of the negotiation, repeatedly and uniformly declared, agreeably to the rule of construction settled by the law of nations, that no stipulation of that kind could have effect as against the British treaty, unless the stipulation were derived from the former treaties, which it is here expressly agreed shall have no operation whatever. This article, however, is less consequential, as it will soon be in the power of the United States, and doubtless also within their wisdom, to refuse to the privateers and prizes of any nation an asylum beyond what the rights of humanity require.

If, with the simple plea of right, unaccompanied with the menaces of power, and unaided by events either in Europe or America, less is at present obtained than justice requires, or than the policy of France should have granted, the undersigned trust that the sincerity and patience of their efforts to obtain all that their country had a right to demand will not be drawn in question.

We have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your most obedient,

OLIVER ELLSWORTH,
WILLIAM R. DAVIE,
WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

The Hon. JOHN MARSHALL, Esq. Secretary of State.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, October 31, 1800.

SIR:

The convention with France, having been published at Paris, immediately found its way into the English newspapers, in which it appeared the day after Mr. Ellsworth's arrival in London; its authenticity being confirmed by him, it became my duty to endeavor, with as much diligence and as extensively as was in my power, to communicate such sentiments and opinions respecting it as would be likely to procure to it a favorable consideration.

After conversing with the Lord Chancellor and some others of the ministers, I found an occasion to mention the subject to the King; and though this was not altogether regular, I had no reason to be dissatisfied with having done so.

After waiting several days, during which I might see and converse with the persons about the court, I yesterday asked a conference with Lord Grenville, which took place this morning. The conversation began by my observing that I wished to speak with him respecting our reconciliation with France, in order that I might communicate to my Government, which would be desirous to understand the light in which it was considered by the British Government. This beginning led to a free and apparently candid conversation respecting it, which was followed by Lord Grenville saying to me that he saw nothing in the convention inconsistent with the treaty between them and us, or which afforded them any ground of complaint; nor did he perceive in it any thing that might not have been expected, unless it was the article respecting convoys, which we were certainly free to make, but which, nevertheless, just at the present juncture, had somewhat of a less friendly appearance than might have been wished. I expressed my satisfaction that I had not been mistaken in believing that the British Government would find nothing to object to in the convention; and remarked, that the article of free bottoms having made a part of the old treaty, it was natural enough that it should be inserted in the new one, and that the provision respecting convoys seemed to be no more than a convenient consequence of that article, by which the visit of the belligerent is not only restrained in its object, but placed under special regulations as to the manner in which it shall be made; and, moreover, that convoys would be indispensable, to protect our trade against French corsairs in the West Indies, which could not at present be controlled by France. Lord Grenville had not manifested any marks of disappointment or discontent concerning the convention; showed no inclination to controvert what I had just said; contenting himself by repeating (but without seeming to place much importance upon the observation,) what he had before said, with regard to their misunderstanding with the northern Powers. The subject of convoys being before us, I thought the occasion not an unfavorable one concisely to suggest certain reflections which had passed in my mind concerning it, and which are the foundation of the observations contained in my No. 80. After some general remarks respecting the rights of neutrals and belligerents, I observed that it seemed to me practicable to devise regulations, by which the trade of neutrals might be secured by convoys, without affecting injuriously the right of search. It might, for example, be stipulated that no ship should be entitled to sail under convoy which should not possess a certificate, in an agreed form, attesting her neutrality, and the neutrality and innocence of her cargo; the consuls or other agents of the belligerent, residing in the neutral countries, might assist in taking the proofs upon which such certificate should be granted; and it might, moreover, be settled that the visit of the belligerent should be confined to the convoying ship, the commander of which, on exhibiting the certificates of the ships under his convoy, should, with them, be entitled to proceed unmolested. Other regulations might be devised, for places where the agents of the belligerent could not, on account of the war, assist in receiving the proofs of neutrality.

Lord Grenville, without hesitation, admitted the fairness of the project, adding that it would be indifferent to them, as belligerents, whether the examination was made by their agents, before the sailing of the neutral ship, or, upon the ocean, by their naval officers.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

"SIR: "LONDON, November 22, 1800.

"Upon the probability of the conclusion of peace, well informed persons continue to differ extremely in their opinions. Austria will make peace if she can make a good bargain, which, as in former wars, she may probably be able to do. England (I mean the Government) desires to make peace with Bonaparte; and, from the language made use of by the English ministers, one would almost be led to think that she is now willing to countenance and support the First Consul upon the very principles which have induced her to oppose those who hitherto have been at the head of the affairs of France.

"Whatever may have been the temper or inclination of this Government, in a different posture of its affairs, and before the convention with France was published, its sentiments in respect to that instrument, and the distinguished manner in which Mr. Ellsworth has been received by the court, have a tendency to show that at present it has no animosity nor unusual prejudice against us; on the contrary, those who disseminate its opinions encourage the people to bear their distresses, arising from the dearness of bread, by holding forth to them the abundant harvest of America, and the prospect of a great supply from thence."

The Senate, having considered the aforegoing convention with France, adopted the following resolution:

IN SENATE, U. S. February 3, 1801.

Resolved, By the Senate of the United States, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein,) that they do consent to and advise the ratification of the convention between the French republic and the United States of America, made at Paris, the 8th day of Vendemiaire, of the 9th year of the French republic; (the 30th day of September, Anno Domini 1800:) Provided, The second article be expunged, and the following article added or inserted:

It is agreed that the present convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the exchange of the ratifications.

The following message was thereupon transmitted to the Senate:

UNITED STATES, March 2, 1801.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I have considered the advice and conduct of the Senate to the ratification of the convention with France under certain conditions. Although it would have been more conformable to my own judgment and inclination to have agreed to that instrument unconditionally, yet, in this point, I found I had the misfortune to differ in opinion from so high a constitutional authority as the Senate. I judged it more consistent with the honor and interest of the United States to ratify it under the conditions prescribed than not at all. I accordingly nominated Mr. Bayard, minister plenipotentiary to the French republic, that he might proceed without delay to Paris, to negotiate the exchange of ratifications. But, as that gentleman has declined his appointment, for reasons equally applicable to every other person suitable for the service, I shall take no further measures relative to this business, and leave the convention, with all the documents, in the office of State, that my successor may proceed with them according to his wisdom.

JOHN ADAMS.

The ratification of the convention which was made by the French Government is contained in the following translation:

Bonaparte, First Consul, in the name of the French people: The Consul of the republic having seen and examined the convention concluded, agreed to, and signed at Paris, the 8th Vendemiaire, ninth year of the French republic, (30th September, 1800,) by the citizens Joseph Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Rœderer, counsellors of state, in virtue of the full powers which have been given to them to this effect, with Messieurs Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, ministers plenipotentiary of the United States, equally furnished with full powers, the tenor of which convention follows:

Approves the above convention in all and each of the articles which are therein contained; declares that it is accepted, ratified, and confirmed; and promises that it shall be inviolably observed.

The Government of the United States, having added to its ratification that the convention should be in force for the space of eight years, and having omitted the second article, the Government of the French republic consents to accept, ratify, and confirm the above convention, with the addition importing that the convention shall be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article: Provided, that by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

In faith whereof, these presents are given. Signed, countersigned, and sealed with the great seal of the republic, at Paris, the twelfth Thermidor, ninth year of the republic, (31st July, 1801.)

BONAPARTE.

The Minister of Exterior Relations,

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

By the First Consul:

The Secretary of State,

HUGUES B. MARET.

The following message of the President and resolution of the Senate terminate the proceedings upon the convention:

DECEMBER 11, 1801.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Early in the last month I received the ratification, by the First Consul of France, of the convention between the United States and that nation. His ratification not being pure and simple, in the ordinary form, I have thought it my duty, in order to avoid all misconception, to ask a second advice and consent of the Senate before I give it the last sanction, by proclaiming it to be a law of the land.

TH: JEFFERSON.

IN SENATE OF THE U. S. December 19, 1801.

Resolved, That the Senate (two-thirds of the members present concurring therein) consider the convention between the United States and the French republic as fully ratified.

6th CONGRESS.] No. 164. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 27, 1801.

UNITED STATES, February 27, 1801.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I transmit you a report of the Secretary of State, with sundry documents relative to the subject of your resolution of the twenty-fourth instant.

JOHN ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 27, 1801.

SIR:

The order of the House of Representatives of the 24th of this month, requesting an account of the depredations committed on the commerce of the United States by vessels of Great Britain, of which complaint has been made to the Government, having been referred to this department, I have the honor to transmit herewith an abstract of such cases as have been complained of since the commencement of the year 1800.

The order of the House having fixed no period at which the account it requests is to commence, I have, from a consideration of the short space for which the present session can continue, thought it compatible with their view to limit the abstract to the time above mentioned.

From various reasons, it is to be presumed that many captures have been made, of which no complaint has been forwarded to the Government. Under this impression, and for the purpose of giving a comprehensive view of the subject, I have thought it not improper to annex to the abstract several extracts of letters from our consuls, and also an extract of a letter from the President of the Chamber of Commerce at Philadelphia to the Secretary of the Navy.

I will also take the liberty to observe, that neither the communications from our minister at London, nor my conversations with the chargé d'affaires of His Britannic Majesty in the United States, would lead to an opinion that any additional orders have been lately given by the British Government, authorizing the system of depredation alluded to in the letter from Mr. Fitzsimmons.

I am, sir, &c.

J. MARSHALL.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 27, 1801.

SIR:

In my report of this day to the President, on the subject of British captures, and which he will have transmitted to Congress, it was accidentally omitted to insert the case of the brigantine Ruby, Captain Wrigley, belonging to Mr. Ambrose Vasse, of Philadelphia. This vessel, proceeding for Port-au-Prince, with a cargo consisting of American produce and some German goods, was lately captured by the British ship of war Tisiphone, and carried to Jamaica, where, the owner informs me, both vessel and cargo were condemned as enemy's property.

I therefore request that the House will consider this letter as an appendage to my report above alluded to.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. MARSHALL.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Abstract of the cases of capture of American vessels by British cruisers, of which complaint has been made to the Government of the United States since the 1*st of January*, 1800.

Ship Gadsen, of Charleston, owned by Frederick Kohn, from Newport to Port Passage; cargo, Carolina tobacco, rice, sugar, and bees-wax, Spanish tobacco, indigo, cocoa, and hides; taken September 9, 1799, by the British sloop of war Pheasant; carried into Halifax; ship and most of the cargo condemned. The reason of condemnation is said by the owner to be because part of the cargo, having been brought from the Spanish colonies, was not landed in America.

Ship Genet, of Boston, owned by Nathaniel Fellows, from Amsterdam to Boston; cargo, gin and iron; taken May 14, 1799, by the British ship of war Director; carried into Yarmouth, (England;) ship, cargo, and private adventure condemned. She was coming out of the Texel when blockaded.

Brigantine Polly, of Philadelphia, owned by John L. Clark, from Amsterdam to Philadelphia; cargo, sundries; taken May 14, 1799, by a blockading squadron off the Texel; carried into Yarmouth, (England;) supposed to have been condemned. She was coming out of the Texel, when blockaded.

Schooner Susanna, of Baltimore, owned by Jonathan Harrison; from Baltimore to Havanna, taken September 29, 1799, by the British ship of war Arab. Sunk by the officers of the Arab chasing her.

Schooner Diana, of Free Town, charterers Gibbs and Channing, Newport, from Newport to Havanna; cargo provisions; taken August 3, 1800, by the Cleopatra frigate: carried into Halifax.

Cutter Crocodile, of New York, owned by Scott and Seamen, from Curaçoa to New York, taken April 5, 1800, by the ship of war Amiable; carried into Kingston, (Jam.;) part of the cargo was Dutch, the remainder American property. The captors, immediately on the capture, made a privateer of the Crocodile, and sent her on a cruise.

Ship Charlotte, of New York, owned by Henry A. and John G. Castor, from New York to Amsterdam; cargo, sugar, coffee, &c.; taken April, 1800, by the Cleopatra frigate; carried into Halifax: vessel and cargo condemned.

Brigantine Sally, of Philadelphia, owned by Stephen Girard, from Batavia to Philadelphia; cargo, sugar and coffee; taken July 20, 1800, by the Cleopatra frigate; carried into Halifax: vessel and cargo condemned. The condemnation appears to be grounded upon the allegation that the owner is a native of France, carrying on a course of trade to a French colony.

N. B. Mr. Girard was naturalized a citizen of Pennsylvania in the year 1777, and has ever since resided in the United States.

Brigantine Ruby, of Philadelphia, owned by Chandler Price, from Philadelphia to New Orleans; cargo, English and German dry goods and groceries; taken December, 1800, by the privateer Brothers, of New Providence.

Schooner George, of Baltimore, owned by William Patterson, from Baltimore to Curaçoa; cargo, gin, flour, linens, &c. &c.; taken October 7, 1800, by order of Commodore Watkins, of Curaçoa, in and at Curaçoa; detained under pretext of ticklenburghs and osnaburghs being contraband.

Maria, of Baltimore, owned by James Biays; in October, 1800, put in requisition at Curaçoa, and sent to Jamaica by the British.

Sloop Little Charlotte, of Bristol, Rhode Island, owned by Charles D'Wolfe, from Bristol to Leghorn; cargo, sugar; taken August 2, 1800, by the privateer Earl of Dublin, of Halifax; vessel and cargo condemned.

Schooner Aurora, owned by R. Johnson & Co. of New York, taken by a privateer of New Providence; cargo condemned, because part of it consisted of tin plates, as stated by the owners.

Ship Elizabeth, owned by J. Codman, of Boston; she appears to have been captured from having broken the law prohibiting the intercourse with France.

Brig Sea Nymph, of Philadelphia, owned by Louis A. Tarrascon, from Philadelphia to St. Andero; cargo, coffee, specie, &c.; taken by a British letter of marque; carried into Lisbon: acquitted after considerable detention.

Brig Gracy, of Baltimore, owned by Rogers and Owings, from Trinidad in Cuba to Baltimore; cargo, sugar, honey, and hides; taken January 6, 1801, by the frigate Retaliation, of Jamaica: vessel and cargo condemned.

Schooner Rover, of Baltimore, owned by Rogers and Owings, from Baltimore to St. Jago, Cuba; cargo, flour, wines, and dry goods; taken by a French royalist privateer, of Jamaica: condemned.

Extract of a letter from William Savage, agent of the United States at Kingston, Jamaica, dated June 5, 1800, to the Secretary of State.

"A number of American seamen in distress have lately been landed from prizes and ships of war, who have been relieved by me, as all American vessels met with, either going to or coming from Curaçoa, Hispaniola, or South America, are brought in here for adjudication; and, in all cases of acquittal the captors appeal, which, I understand, prevents any action being commenced for damages.

"I am, &c."

Extract of a letter from John Gavino, Consul of the United States at Gibraltar, dated November 19, 1800, to the Secretary of State.

"The Venus of New York, Fairchild, from Naples for Malaga, was immediately liberated.

"The Susanna, Spencer, of Charleston, South Carolina, with a cargo of sugar, from said port to Cadiz, brought from Lisbon, where she had been detained upwards of four months for a breach of blockade, attempting to enter Cadiz after warning by Lamouach privateer, Blair, commander, who next day took her. She, prior to Lamouach's first boarding her, was examined by another English privateer, who said nothing of the blockade to Spencer; so that he continued for the port to inquire of the ships of war, having doubts of the veracity of Blair's intimation. She was tried here whilst at Lisbon, without even the captain being present. I claimed ship and cargo as consul, and protested the proceedings. She is since arrived here and condemned ship and cargo, without any further trial, or giving Spencer a hearing, so that he has protested the proceeding, and will appeal.

"The other is the Sea Nymph, Philadelphia, McKiver, who has also been four months at Lisbon, captured by a letter of marque, the Berrill, Captain Toob, from said port of Philadelphia, with coffee, spices, &c., for St. Andero, pretends it to be French property, as that Mr. Tarrascon, the owner, had not resided long enough in the United States to be a citizen thereof; nor Mr. Ferulah, the supercargo, who went from Lisbon to England on account of the long detention there; he has his certificate of citizenship along with him as I am informed. She is libelled for trial.

Extract of a letter from John Gavino, Consul of the United States at Gibraltar, dated December 14, 1800, to the Secretary of State.

"The trial of the Sea Nymph, McKiver, came on the 3d instant, when ship and cargo was liberated by a decree of the Vice Admiralty court; and as damages could not then be ascertained, they are reserved; but I do not as yet find out if the captors mean to appeal."

LISBON, June 27, 1800.

SIR:

I am extremely sorry to inform you of the capture of the five following vessels, by the British, arrived in this port.

The brig Peacock, David Crafts, master, loaded with one hundred butts of Sherry wine, bound from Cadiz to London, with clearance for Altona: the vessel and cargo the sole property of Ebenezer Parsons, of Boston; captured by the Ruse privateer of Guernsey, Paul Bienvenu, master.

The brig King Solomon, James Hewett, master, laden with butter, cheese, and iron hoops, bound from Amsterdam to Cadiz. The brig, the property of Benjamin Hill, of Newport, Rhode Island; the cargo, Hamburg account: captured by the lugger Flying Fish, of Jersey, John Le Rouer, master.

The brig Susannah, J. V. Spencer, master, laden with sugar, bound from Charleston, South Carolina, to Cadiz: the brig and cargo the sole property of Blacklock and Bower, and William Milligan, of Charleston; captured by the Ruse privateer of Guernsey, Paul Bienvenu, master, and La Bouch privateer, of Gibraltar, owned by Jews in Lisbon.

The brig Hind, Daniel Ropes, Jun., master, laden with sugar, cocoa, and fish, bound from Salem to Cadiz; the brig and cargo the sole property of Joseph White and William Orne, of Salem; captured by His Britannic Majesty's frigate Anson, P. C. Durham, commander.

The brig Sea Nymph, James McKiver, master, laden with coffee, pimento, cloves, cotton, dye-wood, &c. bound from Philadelphia to St. Sebastian's; the brig and cargo the property of Lewis A. Tarrascon, of Philadelphia; captured by the armed ship Bauvel, John Toole, master.

The four first captures are made under the idea of Cadiz being a blockaded port; and, as the abovementioned privateers have positive instructions from their owners to capture all vessels going to or coming from Cadiz, and are cruising off that port, I expect this port will soon be filled with neutrals, and, among them, numbers of our merchantmen. I have written Colonel Humphreys to warn our captains at Cadiz, and caution them against coming out of that port for the present.

The last was captured on suspicion of being French property, as the owner's is a French name, and the supercargo on board, Mr. John Augustine Victor Borrouill, also a French name; but having proved to the captors that the property is bona fide American, from the register of the brig and your certificate of citizenship to Mr. Borrouill, they now pretend to detain her on the letter of instruction from the owner to the supercargo, which the captors refuse showing me, saying they will try her under our own laws. These vessels are sent in here under pretence of benefit of convoy to England and Gibraltar; but I understand it is the intention of one of the captors to detain the vessel here and forward the papers on to Gibraltar: which of them it is, my next will inform you.

I have written our consul in London for every judicial information he can furnish me with, and whether it is the opinion of Sir John Nichols and Sir William Scott that Cadiz ought to be considered as blockaded, the trade having been carried on unmolested for upwards of twelve months, and His Majesty's ships on that station boarding and suffering vessels continually to enter and come out.

I have the honor to be, &c.

THOMAS BULKLEY.

To TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

Extract of a letter from Thomas Fitzsimmons, Esq., Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated PHILADELPHIA, February 17, 1801.

"By the public prints you will have seen that a great number of American vessels, bound to and from the Spanish ports in Cuba and on the Main, have been captured by British cruisers. The depredations have so multiplied, that, without a change in their system, or some protection from our own Government, the trade to those places must be entirely abandoned, though forming a very considerable branch of our trade. Premiums of insurance to the Havanna have within a few days advanced from ten to thirty per cent.; and such is the particular situation of those countries, in relation to the British possession, that not one in ten vessels can escape; from New Providence alone, there are above forty privateers, who subsist principally by the plunder of the Americans. The practice is, whenever they are met with, to send them into port; if there are found on board any goods, the produce or manufacture of any countries at war with Great Britain, they are condemned; as is bar-iron, nails, tin, paints, linseed oil, and any strong linens, which are contraband; if the property is found to belong to any persons who are not native Americans, it is either condemned or held under an interlocutory decree, till proofs can be obtained of the citizenship of the owner; and, in every instance, the detention and expenses are so great as to reduce the property, for which no pretence for condemnation can be made, so much as hardly to leave it worth pursuing; these practices are the more mortifying, as they either themselves ship the goods of which they plunder the Americans to the countries to which they do not permit us to carry them, or suffer the people of those countries to come to them and purchase them.

"The proceedings at Jamaica are even more ruinous than at Providence: when they cannot procure a condemnation there, they invariably appeal from the sentence; and, as the Americans can in no other way obtain security than by putting their property in the possession of people there, the whole is swallowed up by commission and charges.

"These enormities are become so great, that the merchants are preparing lists of the captures, and the circumstances attending them, to be laid before the Government; but as any redress through that channel must be distant, they take the liberty of suggesting the propriety of granting them stated convoys for that trade. The passage to and from Havanna is so short, that a few national ships might effectually guard it, except the British should disregard the protection of our flag, which we do not suppose will happen; in any event, our merchants may be protected from privateers, and it is from those principally that we suffer.

"It is wished that a convoy should sail on the first Monday in every month, from Hampton Road, to which place all the vessels from ports to the eastward of that place might rendezvous. Vessels belonging to native citizens, or loaded with native commodities, need not this protection; but the abatement in the premium in all others will oblige them to take advantage of it.

"If the first was provided to sail early in March, there would be several vessels here ready to avail themselves of it; and probably others at New York and Baltimore. As a measure of this kind may involve consequences of national importance, I do not feel myself at liberty to urge it further than that you would be pleased to lay it before the President. I can add, with confidence, that, without some protection of this kind, the merchants of the United States must entirely suspend their trade to those countries, or be ruined in attempting to continue it, although it has been among the most valuable branches of commerce."

7th CONGRESS.] No. 165. [1st SESSION.

BARBARY POWERS.

COMMUNICATED DECEMBER 8, AND DECEMBER 22, 1801.

[The following documents accompanied the message of December 8, 1801, at the opening of the session, and were transmitted by the message of December 22.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to William Eaton, Esq. Consul of the United States at Tunis, dated

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 20, 1801.

"The proofs which have been given by the Bashaw of Tripoli of hostile designs against the United States have, as you will learn from Commodore Dale, determined the President to send into the Mediterranean a squadron of three frigates and a sloop of war, under the command of that officer. Should war have been declared, or hostilities commenced, this force will be immediately employed in the defence and protection of our commerce against the piracies of that regency. It is hoped that the contagion will not have spread either to Tunis or Algiers; but, should one or both of them have followed the perfidious example, their corsairs will be equally repelled and punished.

"The policy of exhibiting a naval force on the coast of Barbary has long been urged by yourself and the other consuls. The present moment is peculiarly favorable for the experiment, not only as it is a provision against an immediate danger, but as we are now at peace and amity with all the rest of the world, and as the force employed would, if at home, be at nearly the same expense, with less advantage to our mariners. The President has, therefore, every reason to expect the utmost exertions of your prudence and address, in giving the measure an impression most advantageous to the character and interest of the United States. In effecting this object, the means must be left, in a great degree, to your knowledge of the local and other circumstances, which cannot be understood at this distance. You will, of course, take due pains to satisfy the Bey, that the United States are desirous of maintaining peace with all nations who are willing to live in peace; that they have given abundant evidence of their disposition to cultivate the friendship of the Barbary regencies, and of himself in particular; and that, if the flag of the United States should be engaged in war with either of them, it will be a war of defence and necessity, not of choice or provocation. You will also give every friendly explanation and assurance, on this occasion, which may be requisite for the consuls and agents of other Powers residing at Tunis.

"You are authorized to inform the Bey of Tunis that a vessel is now preparing to take in the cargo which will complete the regalia due to him, and that no time will be lost in getting her on her voyage."

Note.—The same was written to Mr. O'Brien, except the last paragraph, with the following addition:

"You will, of course, take due pains to satisfy the Dey that the United States are desirous of maintaining peace with all nations who are willing to live in peace; that they have given abundant evidence of their disposition to cultivate the friendship of the Barbary regencies, and of himself in particular; that they expect from his good faith an efficacious interposition, according to our treaty with him, for guarantying the treaty with the Bashaw of Tripoli.

"The United States, it appears, will, before you receive this, be three years in arrears to the Dey. Towards making up the deficiency, the "George Washington" is under active preparation to carry timber and other stores, for at least one annuity. Commodore Dale is charged with thirty thousand dollars, which the President hopes the Dey may have been induced to accept as a commutation for the stores due for another. He has also in charge four hundred yards of cloth and thirty pieces of linen for the biennial present. Should you not have prevailed on the Dey, and should find it still impossible to prevail on him to accept the thirty thousand dollars in lieu of the stores, without the application of four, five, or six thousand dollars, you will be supplied with that sum; and the sum of thirty thousand dollars will then be made up out of other moneys in the commodore's hands. Should there be no possibility of inducing the Dey to the measure, even with this aid, the whole sum of thirty thousand dollars is to be retained by the commodore. The balance for the remaining, or third year, will be sent as soon as it can be done, either in stores or money, as may be agreed. You are already aware how much both the conveniency and interest of the United States will be promoted by substituting money for stores, rating the latter at thirty thousand dollars, as a permanent regulation, and will take due pains to bring about such a change. You may find it, perhaps, an argument of some weight with the Dey for preferring money to stores, that the former can always be remitted with more punctuality, and that, in times of war, such of the latter as are held to be contraband by the European law of nations, may be exposed to captures by which he must be affected as well as the United States. In case you should succeed in the pecuniary commutation proposed, it will be proper, in defining the sum of thirty thousand dollars, to refer to some standard of weight and fineness in the metal, that will secure the United States against arbitrary regulations of the Dey, and quiet his jealousy, if he should have any, of imposition on the part of the United States. The Spanish dollars now in circulation may, for example, answer this purpose.

"The pretensions set up against the United States, in the case of the ship Fortune, for indemnification to the owners of the merchandise with which she was laden, show the disadvantage of employing our vessels in the freight of Algerine property. You will, therefore, as far as you can, discourage that branch of trade; and, as far as it cannot be done, will take care to repress all expectation or claim whatsoever, to throw on the United States the losses by capture under their flags.

"One subject of equal importance and delicacy still remains. The sending to Constantinople the national ship of war the "George Washington," by force, under the Algerine flag, and for such a purpose, has deeply affected the sensibility, not only of the President, but of the people of the United States. Whatever temporary effects it may have had favorable to our interests, the indignity is of so serious a nature, that it is not impossible that it may be deemed necessary, on a fit occasion, to revive the subject. Viewing it in this light, the President wishes that nothing may be said or done by you that may unnecessarily preclude the competent authority from animadverting on that transaction in any way that a vindication of the national honor may be thought to prescribe."

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to James L. Cathcart, Esq. Consul at Tripoli, dated

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 21, 1801.

"The threat of hostilities against the trade of the United States by the Bashaw, certified in your communications as issuing immediately from the Bashaw himself, in a translation of his letter of 25th May last, certified by his interpreter, Farfara, has determined the President to send into the Mediterranean a squadron of three frigates and a sloop of war, under Commodore Dale, by whom this is written. You will also receive from him a letter to the Bashaw from the President.

"Should war have been declared, or hostilities commenced, before the arrival of this squadron, it will be immediately employed in the defence and protection of our commerce against the piratical attacks of the Bashaw's corsairs. Should war have been neither declared nor commenced, it is expected by the President that you will exert all your prudence and address in rendering the appearance of the squadron and the letter from the President subservient to the preservation of peace, and to such impressions on the Bashaw as will be most favorable to the dignity and interests of the United States. The President relies the more on the zeal and success of these exertions, as the policy of exhibiting a naval force on the coast of Barbary has long been urged by you and the other consuls. To aid your exertions on this occasion, you will be supplied by Commodore Dale with a sum, if necessary, which will be communicated by him. In a letter which I have written, by the present opportunity, to Mr. O'Brien, he is instructed to cultivate the good will of the Dey of Algiers, and to call on him for his stipulated interposition as guarantee of the treaty between the United States and the Bashaw. You will not fail to make the best use you can of the interposition, if it be afforded."

THOMAS JEFFERSON, President of the United States of America, to the illustrious and honored Bey of Tripoli of Barbary, whom God preserve.

GREAT AND RESPECTED FRIEND:

The assurances of friendship which our consul has given you, and of our sincere desire to cultivate peace and commerce with your subjects, are faithful expressions of our dispositions; and you will continue to find proofs of them in all those acts of respect and friendly intercourse which are due between nations standing, as we do, in the relations of peace and amity with each other.

At the conclusion of our treaty with you, we endeavored to prove our respect for yourself, and satisfaction at that event, by such demonstrations as gave you then entire content: and we are disposed to believe that, in rendering into another language those expressions in your letter of the 25th of May last, which seem to imply purposes inconsistent with the faith of that transaction, your intentions have been misconstrued. On this supposition, we renew to you sincerely assurances of our constant friendship, and that our desire to cultivate peace and commerce with you remains firm and unabated.

We have found it expedient to detach a squadron of observation into the Mediterranean sea, to superintend the safety of our commerce there, and to exercise our seamen in nautical duties. We recommend them to your hospitality and good offices, should occasion require their resorting to your harbors. We hope their appearance will give umbrage to no Power: for, while we mean to rest the safety of our commerce on the resources of our own strength and bravery in every sea, we have yet given to this squadron in strict command to conduct themselves towards all friendly Powers with the most perfect respect and good order; it being the first object of our solicitude to cherish peace and friendship with all nations with whom it can be held on terms of equality and reciprocity.

I pray God, very great and respected friend, to have you always in his holy keeping.

Written at the city of Washington, the twenty-first day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one.

TH: JEFFERSON.

By the President:
JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Form of a letter which Commodore Dale was directed to write to the Dey of Algiers and the Bey of Tunis.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

Having the honor to command a squadron of observation, despatched by the President of the United States into the Mediterranean sea, to support the safety of their commerce threatened with attacks by the Bashaw of Tripoli, and to exercise our seamen in nautical duty, the instructions that I have received from the President require that, in approaching your harbors, I should tender the profound respect that is due to your excellency's dignity and character, and should recommend the squadron under my command to your hospitality and good offices. I leave to the consul of the United States the task of explaining more particularly the friendly dispositions of the United States towards your excellency, the proofs with which he is charged of their desire to maintain the treaty between the two Powers, and the reliance of the President on similar dispositions on your part; for myself, I only make use of the occasion to assure your excellency of the sensibility with which I shall experience your friendly countenance and accommodations, and of the sentiments of reverence and exalted esteem with which

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 21, 1801.

For a considerable time past suspicions have prevailed that a rupture with the United States was intended by the Bashaw of Tripoli. Of late, the alarms and proofs have been such as to impose on the President the obligation of making immediately the most effectual provision within his authority for the defence and protection of our Mediterranean commerce, in case it should be attacked from that quarter. At the last session of Congress six frigates were directed by law to be kept as a peace establishment. Out of this force, three frigates and also a sloop of war have been equipped, and will sail for the Mediterranean in a few days, under the command of Commodore Dale. Should war have been declared, or hostilities actually been commenced against our trade, this force will be employed in the most effectual manner for its safety. Should the means which have been or may be employed to obviate the necessity of such an application of the force be successful, the squadron, after cruising a sufficient time in the Mediterranean, perhaps, if circumstances should not render it unadvisable, as far as the Levant, and towards Constantinople, will return to the United States.

The expedition will, by this means, be not without its use, whatever may be the state of things on its arrival. It will have the effect, from which so much advantage has been promised by our consuls and others, of exhibiting to the Barbary Powers a respectable specimen of the naval faculties of the United States. It will exercise our mariners and instruct our officers in the line of their service, and in a sea which it may be particularly useful for them to understand. And as they form a part of the peace establishment, the measure will add but inconsiderably to the expense otherwise to be incurred. The United States being now also happily at peace and amity with all the European Powers, the moment is the more favorable in that view of the subject.

The President has thought proper that this early information and explanation should be given to you, that, being fully possessed of the causes and object of the expedition, you may guard it against any misconception or misrepresentation that may by possibility be attached to it; and, moreover, prepare the Government where you are to lend to this squadron such hospitalities and accommodations in its ports, or elsewhere, as opportunities may claim, and as it would be incumbent on the United States to reciprocate.

The friendly disposition felt by the United States towards ——— justifies them in their confidence that no convenient proof of a like disposition will be withheld; and of this friendly disposition you are authorized and instructed by the President, on all proper occasions, to give the most explicit and cordial assurances.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great consideration, your most obedient servant.

To RUFUS KING, London,
DAVID HUMPHREYS, Madrid,
WILLIAM SMITH, Lisbon,
W. V. MURRAY, Hague.

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 21, 1801.

The proofs which have been received of the hostile purposes of the Bashaw of Tripoli having imposed on the President the obligation of providing immediately for the safety of our Mediterranean commerce, he has judged proper to send to the coast of Barbary a squadron of three frigates and a sloop of war, under the command of Commodore Dale. The squadron will sail in a very few days from this date. Should war have been declared, or hostilities commenced, Commodore Dale is instructed to make the most effectual use of his force for the object to which it is destined. Should the means employed by our consuls, and those which accompany this expedition, for obviating such an event, be successful, the squadron, then, after cruising for some time in the Mediterranean, perhaps, if circumstances should not forbid, into the Levant, and towards Constantinople, will return to the United States. The expedition will, by this means, be not without its use, whatever may be the state of things on its arrival. It will have the effect, from which so much advantage has been promised by our consuls and others, of exhibiting to the Barbary Powers a naval force from the United States. It will exercise our mariners, and instruct our officers in the line of their service, and in a sea where, more than any other, their services may be wanted; and as they form a part of the peace establishment fixed by law, the measure will add but inconsiderably to the expense that would otherwise be incurred. The United States being also happily at peace with all the Powers of Europe, the moment is the more favorable in every view that can be taken of it.

The President has thought proper that you should be furnished with the information here given, in order, first, that you may be ready to afford every friendly and useful accommodation that occasions may admit, to the squadron, or any part of it: secondly, that, being possessed of the objects of the expedition and the considerations which led to it, you may be able, by proper explanations, to prevent its being misunderstood. The United States persist steadfastly in their desire of living in peace and friendship with all nations who will permit them; and on all occasions where assurances to that effect can be proper, you are authorized to make them in the most satisfactory manner.

I am, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

Extract of a letter from James Leander Cathcart to the Secretary of State.

TRIPOLI, April 18, 1800.

"I had the honor of receiving yours of the 15th of January on the 13th instant, and am happy my conduct has been approved of by the President. Yours to Dr. M'Donogh I delivered to the British consul to forward to him, or to keep until his arrival. I have already informed you that he departed from hence with Commodore Campbell last January, in order to solicit the court of Portugal for the consulate of this regency, he having the commodore's promise of recommendations.

"In consequence of the decease of our political father, I sent my dragoman to inform the Bashaw that the next day I should hoist the banners of the United States half-mast, the only token of respect which I had in my power to pay to the manes of our much beloved patriot, intending to wait a proper opportunity to communicate to him your intimation. The Bashaw sent me a very polite message, expressing his concern for our loss, and requesting to know if the President had received his letter, which was forwarded by the Sophia. I answered in the affirmative, and ordered the dragoman to inform his excellency that I would wait on him when he was at leisure.

"In the evening he sent Farfara to inform me that he was indisposed, or would have been glad to see me; and requested, if I had any thing to impart, that I would communicate it to Farfara. I accordingly requested him to express to the Bashaw his excellency the President's satisfaction with the arrangements that took place last year, and to assure him that he had never considered him as dependent upon either of the other regencies; that he had always treated him as an independent prince, and the Government of the United States would always consider him with as much respect, and treat him with the same friendship, that they did the heads of the other regencies. Farfara returned with the following answer: 'His excellency the Bashaw has desired me to request you to acquaint the President of the United States that he is exceedingly pleased with his proffers of friendship; that the respect which he has shown to his communication is really flattering; that, had his protestations been accompanied with a frigate or brig of war, such as we had given the Algerines, he would be still more inclined to believe them genuine; that compliments, although acceptable, were of very little value, and that the heads of the Barbary States knew their friends by the value of the presents that they received from them.'

"It being too late for any answer that evening, I made such comments on the Bashaw's message as might serve to eradicate from the mind of the Jew the most distant expectation that the President would ever make so great a sacrifice, which I informed him was entirely incompatible with the interests of the United States.

"Considering it highly improper to delay giving a direct, explicit, and categorical answer to the Bashaw's insinuation, I sent my dragoman to the castle to request an audience; I having previously formed a resolution never to employ a third person whenever the honor or the interest of my country was concerned. The dragoman informed me that his excellency had seen Farfara, and if I had any further communication to make, to employ him, as he was very much indisposed. Thus was I disappointed.

"Farfara waited upon me in the afternoon, when I requested him to inform the Bashaw, that, if he supposed that the cruisers which were sent by our Government to Algiers were given gratuitously, he had been misinformed; that, during our negotiation last year, I had acquainted him that the frigate was given to that regency in lieu of cash, for the ransom of our citizens, which had been redeemed on credit more than a year before her arrival; that the cruisers were built on commission, and paid for in cash out of the public treasury, and were not the property of the Dey, as he supposed; that I had copies of their accounts by me which he should peruse if he thought proper, whereby he would be informed of the magnitude of his expectation, and the improbability of the United States having given them gratuitously; that I was sensible how disagreeable it would be to disappoint expectations when once formed; I therefore found it my duty to prevent any taking place, in order to avoid the chagrin attending a positive refusal, which, from the nature of the request, must naturally be expected from the President of the United States.

"The Bashaw returned, in answer, that he had concluded peace with the United States for much less than he had received from other nations, and that he knew his friends by what he received from them.

"I shall by no means broach this subject to the Bashaw again, as I have hindered him from having any ground for expectation, and shall continue to act in the same manner should he ever make it a topic of conversation, as he can have no pretext to make a demand, and only insinuates that he expects some mark of the President's friendship more substantial than compliments. I imagine it will be best to take no further notice of it. The appearance of our frigates in the Mediterranean will, I hope, eradicate any expectation that he may have flattered himself with, if any really exists; and, until that period, believe me, sir, our commerce will never be upon a respectable footing in these seas."

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated

"Give me leave to inform you, in addition to mine of the 18th of April, a copy of which is enclosed with this despatch, that on the 21st of said month a board of consuls were called by the Bashaw, relative to the affairs of Sweden, in order to facilitate, as much as possible, his depredations and unjust demands upon that nation. As I have already forwarded to you the particulars of their last arrangement, I at present refer you to the copy of the certificate herewith enclosed for the result. During the course of conversation, the Bashaw observed, 'that he never made reprisals on any nation, or declared war, but in consequence of their promises not being fulfilled, or for a want of due respect being shown him; that he conceived himself entitled to the same respect that was shown to the Bashaws of Algiers and Tunis, but that some nations gave more to the officers in each of those regencies than they had given to him for their peace.' The last remark was evidently pointed at the United States, but as it was made in general terms, I thought proper not to seem to understand it, especially as I could say very little more on the subject than what I had already communicated to him through the agency of Signior Farfara.

"On the 2d of May a courier arrived from Tunis, which brought me the copies of your letters of the 15th of January, which arrived in the ship Hero. Before I had time to read them, Farfara came and informed me that the Bashaw wanted to see me immediately. I asked him if he knew what his excellency wanted; he said he did not: that he had received letters from Tunis, and seemed very much irritated. It being late in the evening, I waited on him in deshabille, when the following conversation took place, which I have endeavored to render verbatim:

"'You have received letters from America: how were they brought to Tunis?'

"'In a vessel direct from America.'

"'What is her business at Tunis?'

"'She has brought the stores stipulated by treaty with that regency.'

"'What do they consist of?'

"'I do not know the particular articles which compose her cargo, but it chiefly consists of lumber and articles, such as were promised to your excellency when our peace took place.'

"'What do your letters from your Government contain?'

"'They are merely copies of what I had already received, the contents of which your excellency was informed by Farfara.'

"This being a favorable opportunity to know whether our broker had acted with candor, I repeated what was contained in mine of the 18th of April, and found by the Bashaw's answers (which were exactly what Farfara had before informed me) that he had acted honestly.

"The Bashaw observed that the United States had made liberal presents to Algiers and Tunis; that he was informed of the particulars of all our negotiations; that he even had a list of the cargo which had arrived at Tunis: that it is worth a treasure. 'Why do not the United States send me a voluntary present? They have acted with me as if they had done every thing against their will. First, they solicited the interference of the Dey of Algiers, in consequence of which I concluded a peace with them for almost nothing in comparison to what I had received from other nations. I having received many favors from Hassan Bashaw during the continuance of the revolution in this kingdom. They next made me wait more than two years before they sent their consul, and then he came without the stipulated stores. Nevertheless, in order to convince them of my good and friendly intentions, I accepted of the small sum of eighteen thousand dollars in lieu thereof, not doubting but they would be grateful enough to make me some return for my civility; but I have the mortification to be informed that they have now sent a ship load of stores to Tunis, besides promising a present of jewels, and to me they have sent compliments. But I have cruisers as well as Tunis, and as good raizes and sailors. I am an independent prince as well as the Bashaw of Tunis, and I can hurt the commerce of any nation as much as the Tunisians. Why, then, should so great a difference be made?'

"From the tenor of the Bashaw's harangue, I perceived that his aim was to intimidate me to say something that might hereafter be interpreted into a promise of a present, the value of which he would probably dictate himself. I therefore answered him as follows:—

"'Whatever information your excellency has received relative to the value of the presents or stores which have been given to Tunis, it has been amazingly exaggerated. We have never made any but what were stipulated by treaty, nor can we ever make voluntary presents, it being incompatible with our form of Government, the funds of the United States not being at the disposal of the President until an appropriation is made by an act of the Legislature. The funds for carrying our treaty with Tripoli into effect are exhausted; and last year your excellency wrote to the President of the United States that you were contented with what you had already received. You, therefore, in justice, could not expect any thing at present from the United States, but a reciprocal tender of friendship. Had your excellency preferred the stores to cash, and waited with patience until they were forwarded, as the Bey of Tunis has done, I am convinced they would have arrived long ere now. But, at present, as the United States have fulfilled the stipulations of the treaty, they are not in arrears to this regency, and any demands upon them must naturally be very unexpected.' The Bashaw observed it was late, had coffee served, and said he would converse with me upon the subject at some other opportunity. I wished him a very good evening.

"May 4, the Siddi Mahomed Daguize and Signior Farfara came to the American house and informed me that the Bashaw had ordered them to ask me if I had taken any resolution in consequence of the conversation which I had with him on the 2d inst. I informed them that I had taken none whatever, and that it seemed unaccountable to me that his excellency should expect any other answer after what I had informed him in their presence. They staid about an hour, during which time their conversation tended to persuade me that, considering the Bashaw's character, it was certainly the interest of the United States to make a sacrifice; that, otherwise, it would be impossible to remain long on good terms with him. I made use of the same arguments which I had done before. I, therefore, will not tire you with a repetition.

"At six, P. M. they returned, and informed me that the Bashaw was very much displeased, and had ordered them to acquaint me that he was informed that the Sahibtappa at Tunis had received more than forty thousand dollars from the United States, in cash, besides presents; that he had received very little more, and that he had never imagined the United States meant to put him on an equality with one of the Bey of Tunis's ministers.

"I observed that the Bashaw was misinformed by his correspondent, who, in order to ingratiate himself in his favor, had informed him of things which had never taken place; that he was giving himself, as well as them and me, a great deal of trouble, without any hopes of reaping the least benefit therefrom; that I requested them to inform his excellency that I had not power to offer him a dollar, and that there were no funds in the United States appropriated for maintaining our peace with Tripoli, as we had carried our treaty into effect already; that he had written to the President of the United States, the Dey of Algiers, and Bey of Tunis; that he had settled with the agent of the United States, and had received a cash payment in lieu and in full of all demands, and that he was content; that only three years and a half had elapsed since our treaty commenced; that the first year he had received forty thousand dollars in cash, and the value of eight thousand in presents; that the second he had received twelve thousand dollars; and that last year he had received eighteen thousand, and presents to the value of four thousand more: that, on the circumcision of his son, Siddi Aly, I had made him a present superior to the presents which were made him by the consuls of other nations on the same occasion; that, consequently, the Government of the United States were not deficient either in their respect to him, or tokens of friendship, as he had received in the short period of three years and a half cash and presents to the amount of eighty-three thousand dollars, exclusive of ten thousand measures of grain, which Hassan Bashaw had made him a present of, in consequence of his having concluded a treaty with the United States, which was worth at Tripoli near twenty thousand dollars more; that I was persuaded that, if his excellency would give himself the trouble to reflect on the circumstances which had taken place since the commencement of the treaty between the United States and this regency, he would not hesitate a moment in acknowledging the justice and propriety of my observations.

"In the evening, the Bashaw's emissaries returned, and informed me that they had encountered great difficulty in persuading the Bashaw to believe that the consul had not power to make him a present without an express order from his Government. His excellency said that he had received many presents from the consuls of other nations, and that their conduct had afterwards been approved. They observed that the form of Government of the United States was vastly different from the Government of every other nation with whom his excellency was at peace; that he had a recent example that the powers of a consul were limited, in the result of the Swedish consul's negotiation, he having arranged the affairs of his nation without receiving orders from his court; that he knew the consequence; his bills were protested, he had received a severe reprimand from the King of Sweden, and was immediately suspended; and that his excellency might depend that the American consul would take care never to be reduced to a similar predicament, whatever might be the consequence of his non-compliance with his excellency's demand.

"They further informed me that the Bashaw had ordered them to request me to write to my Government to inform them that, when he had written to the President of the United States, he was contented with what he had received; that he really was so, on a supposition that the presents to him bore some proportion to those that had been promised to Tunis; that, at present, he was informed to the contrary, and that he felt himself amazingly hurt when he considered that he had been treated with indifference; and that he never would be convinced that the friendship of the United States was sincere until there was a greater equality observed in their donations between the two nations; or, in other words, until he received some further marks of the President's esteem more substantial than mere compliments. They said that, although the Bashaw was inclined to credit the impossibility of the consul's making him a present without orders from his court, he likewise was sensible how much depended on the manner of his representation; that he believed he had treated him with every respect since his arrival at Tripoli, and he requested I would write in such terms as would ensure him from the mortification of being disappointed; adding, 'This I expect from the consul, as he values my future favor and a happy result to the objects of his mission.' I replied, that the object contemplated by the United States, in sending an agent the vast distance of near six thousand miles, was to endeavor to maintain a friendly intercourse between the two nations on honorable and equitable terms; that, as it had pleased God to employ me as the instrument to promote so desired an effect, he might rest assured I should take pleasure in representing facts for the consideration of Government, in as favorable a manner as the dignity annexed to my office would admit; that, as it would be the height of presumption in me to dictate to the President of the United States what he ought to do in the present case, so, on the other hand, I by no means considered it to be a part of my official duty in any means to oppose the liberal intentions of Government, should they be found disposed to make him a present; but, on the contrary, should I receive orders to that effect, I would take pleasure in executing them; but must again beg leave to repeat that the issue depended on them only. They retired, promised to make a faithful report to his excellency, protested they would use their influence in favor of the United States, and requested me not to close my letters until I heard further from the Bashaw, either direct or through their agency.

"May the 6th. I waited on the Bashaw to pay my compliments to him, in consequence of the festival. He treated me with great politeness, but I could easily discern that it was against his inclination. There was something in his countenance that indicated his smiles were not sincere, and ought not to be depended on.

"May the 10th. Farfara came to the American house, and informed me that the Bashaw had concluded to write to the President of the United States himself, as he entertained some suspicion that I would not write to Government with sufficient energy; that the Bashaw would send me his letter the first opportunity that should present, to forward it, which he hoped I had no objection to do. I replied, none in the least; and requested Farfara to procure me a copy, if possible; which he promised to do. Having waited until the date of this despatch without having heard any thing more on the subject, I hastened to get my despatches in readiness to forward by the first conveyance. Should any thing intervene worthy of notice before I receive the Bashaw's letter, it shall be the subject of another despatch."

Extract of a letter from James Leander Cathcart to the Secretary of State, dated TRIPOLI, October 18th, 1801.

"On the 16th I waited upon the Bashaw, in company with Captain Carpenter, to demand satisfaction for the insult our flag had suffered, in having one of our vessels brought in here without any visible cause, her papers and passport being in perfect order; and likewise, to demand restitution of property plundered from the brig.

"The Bashaw answered, that he had not given orders to the Raiz to bring in American vessels; that he had broke him, and dismissed him from his service, and then gave orders to the Minister of Marine to have every article that was plundered from the brig returned.

"The Bashaw then commenced thus: 'Consul, there is no nation I wish more to be at peace with than yours; but all nations pay me, and so must the Americans.' I answered, 'We have already paid you all we owe you, and are nothing in arrears.' He answered, 'That for the peace we had paid him, it was true; but to maintain the peace we had given him nothing.' I observed, that the terms of our treaty were to pay him the stipulated cash, stores, &c. in full of all demands, forever; and then repeated nearly to the same effect as is contained in my despatch of the 12th of May, which, to avoid repetition, I forbear inserting. The Bashaw then observed, 'that we had given a great deal to Algiers and Tunis, and that the Portuguese captain informed him that, when he passed by Algiers, about the middle of last month, he had seen an American frigate in the bay, which he supposed had brought more presents to the Dey. Why do they neglect me in their donations? Let them give me a stipulated sum annually, and I will be reasonable as to the amount.'

"In answer to the first, I replied, that it was true that one of our frigates was at Algiers, being one of a squadron of three forty-four gun ships and some smaller vessels which were appointed to protect our commerce in the Mediterranean; but whether they had presents on board for the regency of Algiers, or not, I could not inform him; that some of them would have been at Tripoli before now, had I not informed them that they had better stay away until the spring, upon account of the badness of this road, which renders it very unsafe at this season. And in answer to his proposal of an annuity, I replied with some warmth, exactly what I had requested Daguize to inform him of in my name yesterday evening. 'Well, then,' replied the Bashaw, 'let your Government give me a sum of money, and I will be content; but paid I will be, one way or other. I now desire you to inform your Government that I will wait six months for an answer to my letter to the President: that if it does not arrive in that period, and if it be not satisfactory, if it does arrive, that I will declare war in form against the United States. Inform your Government,' said he, 'how I have served the Swedes, who concluded their treaty since yours. Let them know that the French, English, and Spaniards have always sent me presents from time to time, to preserve their peace; and if they do not do the same, I will order my cruisers to bring their vessels in whenever they can find them.' He then turned to Daguize, and told him to explain to Captain Carpenter what he had informed me, (they both speaking French,) and added, that he did not wish to make it a private affair between the consul and him, and desired him to make it public, as he wished the whole world to know it. He then told Daguize to tell the captain that he hoped the United States would [not] neglect him, as six or eight vessels of the value of his would amount to a much larger sum than he ever expected to get from the United States for remaining at peace. 'Besides,' said he, 'I have a great desire to have some captains like you here to teach me to speak English.'

I answered that it was absolutely impossible to receive answers to the letters which he desired me to write by Captain Carpenter in six months, as it would be nearly that time before he would get home, upon account of the winter season; that I expected his excellency would wait until the answer arrived, let that be long or short; and observed, that none but those who held a correspondence with the devil could determine whether he would be content with the President's answer or not, as neither the President nor myself knew what would content him. I therefore requested him to inform me explicitly what were his expectations. To the first he answered, 'I will not only wait for answers from your President, but I will now detain the brig, and write to him again; but I expect when he sends his answers that they will be such as will empower you to conclude with me immediately; if they are not, I will capture your vessels; and as you have frequently informed me that your instructions do not authorize you to give me a dollar, I will, therefore, not inform you what I expect until you are empowered to negotiate with me; but you may inform your President that, if he is disposed to pay me for my friendship, I will be moderate in my demands.' The Bashaw then rose from his seat, and went out of the room, leaving me to make what comment I thought proper upon his extraordinary conduct."

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated

MAY 27, 1800.

"Since the date of the enclosed despatch, I heard nothing from the Bashaw until the evening of the 25th instant, when Siddi Mahomed Daguize sent me the original in Arabic, of which the enclosed is a literal translation. The only conclusion which can be drawn from the Bashaw's proceedings is, that he wants a present; and if he does not get one, he will forge pretences to commit depredations on the property of our fellow-citizens. His letter to the President will be the means of keeping him quiet until he receives an answer, provided no unnecessary delay is made, as he will expect to reap a benefit therefrom. Should Government think proper to make him a present, it will have the desired effect probably for one year, but not longer. I, therefore, can see no alternative but to station some of our frigates in the Mediterranean; otherwise, we shall be continually subject to the same insults which the Imperials, Danes, Swedes, and Ragusans have already suffered, and will still continue to suffer."

Translated extract from a letter of the Bashaw of Tripoli to the President of the United States.

MAY 25, 1800.

"After having cultivated the branches of our good will, and paved the way for a good understanding and perfect friendship which we wish may continue forever, we make known that the object and contents of this, our present letter, is, that whereas your consul, who resides at our court in your service, has communicated to us, in your name, that you have written to him, informing him that you regarded the regency of Tripoli in the same point of view as the other regencies of Barbary, and to be upon the same footing of friendship and importance. In order to further strengthen the bonds of a good understanding, blessed be God, may he complete and grant to you his high protection! But, our sincere friend, we could wish that these your expressions were followed by deeds and not by empty words. You will, therefore, endeavor to satisfy us by a good manner of proceeding. We, on our part, will correspond with you, with equal friendship, as well in words as deeds. But if only flattering words are meant, without performance, every one will act as he finds convenient. We beg a speedy answer, without neglect of time, as a delay on your part cannot but be prejudicial to your interests. In the mean time, we wish you happiness.

"Given in Tripoli, in Barbary, the 29th of the moon Hegia, the year of the Hegira 1214, which corresponds with the 25th May, 1800."

Copy of a letter from Mr. O'Brien to Captain Bainbridge.

SIR:

Your letter to me of this date I have received, and seriously considered its contents, and shall observe, sir, that from the day the United States' ship, under your command, arrived in this port, and to this day, it has been generally supposed that the regency would insist that the United States' ship should proceed to the Levant on the business or mission of this regency. On the 18th ult., when you went with me to pay your respects to the Dey, after a little Algerine ceremony, the Dey said he would want this ship as a favor from the United States, to carry his ambassador and presents to Constantinople, and return on the business to Algiers. I observed to the Dey that the captain or consul had no orders or power which, in any respects, could justify us in acquiescing in his demand; that, without the orders of the United States, we could not do any such thing; that we, having no orders, we could make no responsibility; that the captain could not protect his property against the Portuguese or Neapolitans; that your orders were to return to the United States, and by orders you could only defend your ship against French corsairs. The Dey did not seem satisfied with these explanations; that, shortly after, I repeated nearly the same objections on this business to the Algerine prime minister.

On the 26th ult. the Dey sent for me and the British consul, and asked me if I was still determined not to acquiesce in making responsibility, and carrying his ambassador and presents. I again repeated all the arguments which I made use of on the 18th ult., and added, as this vessel belonged to the Government of the United States, and we having no fixed peace or treaty with the Italian states or with the Grand Signior, that this ship and crew would be in a very singular predicament in going to Constantinople on the business of the regency, we having no ambassador or consul at these places. The Dey answered, passionately, that these were all excuses; that other nations had rendered Algiers the like favors; but that, if the British consul would promise faithfully that a British ship of war would come here and go to the Levant on this mission, under this consideration he would let the American ship return to her country. The British consul, John Falcon, Esq. promised and assured the Dey (in my presence) that, as Lord Keith had promised to send a ship of war on this business, said ship might be daily expected. The Dey observed he would wait a few days, before he would fully determine, to see if the British ship would arrive.

The Dey remained undetermined until the 3d instant, when arrived at Algiers, from Mahon, a British ship of war of twenty-four guns, sent by the orders of Lord Keith, intentionally, to carry the ambassador and presents of Algiers to Constantinople. This business seemed finished and settled in order that the British ship of war would proceed on the business. But, from the 4th instant to this date, the Dey and ministry, and sundry persons of influence, started many difficulties relative to the mission of the regency going in the British ship, and finally objected to go. When this morning the Dey came to town from his country seat, and at 10, A. M. sent for me, and told me, without any alternative, the United States' ship should do him the favor to carry his ambassador and presents to Constantinople; that, if this favor or demand was not complied with, he no longer holds to his friendship with the United States.

On my declaring that I or the captain of the United States' ship had no orders, and could not justify ourselves to our Government to acquiesce, the Dey got very angry, and declared that he considered every thing we did say, or could say, to be excuses not to do him the favor he required; and if this favor was not acquiesced to, he knew what to do; that other nations frequently did it, and he could see no reason or motive which should prevent me, on the part of the United States, acquiescing to the request.

I again repeated to the Dey that I or the captain could make no responsibility on the part of the United States; that we could not think his property safe under the American flag from the capture of his enemies; that the ship sailed dull or heavy; that, as it was war time, a thousand difficulties might happen. The Dey hastily observed that God was great, that all was on his head, that all difficulties would be surmounted.

I again declared that I or the captain had no orders which would, in any respect, justify ourselves to acquiesce. The Dey said he would justify us, and that the ship should go per force, and that we had no alternative but to do him this favor; that his mind and his minister's were soured against the British, and that, on this account, he rejected the British ship, and would insist his request should be complied with.

The Dey said he would send his flag to the marine to be hoisted at the mast head of the American ship. I answered I was very sorry on account of his determination, and withdrew; went and explained to the prime minister all that had passed or was said on this business between the Dey and me.

The prime minister observed that the Dey's mind was so positively fixed and determined on this affair, that there would be no alternative but to comply, to prevent greater evils, reminding me of several overt acts of this regency to the consuls of other nations and their affairs; that he had tried to prevent the Dey from sending the American ship, but that it had no effect.

At meridian, I and Captain Bainbridge were sent for by the general of marine, when we made use of all those arguments which are heretofore detailed. The general of marine declared that there was no alternative but to comply. After our retiring from the marine half an hour, the general of marine sent to the consular house of the United States, to acquaint us that it was the orders of the Dey of Algiers that the flag of Algiers should be hoisted to the main-topgallant-mast-head of the American ship. That we answered, all was per force; that we were in their power, and the regency, of course, might do as they had a mind. Shortly after, we determined to see the Dey, and sent the American dragoman to acquaint the Dey that the consul of the United States and commandant of the United States' ship, demanded an audience.

At two, P. M. we were in the presence of the Dey, and stated all those difficulties, and all our former objections, that we had no orders, could not justify ourselves, and could make no responsibility. The Dey observed, that there was no alternative but to comply; that, in doing him this favor, he never would forget it on the part of the United States, and that, when he did, God would forget him; that he would write to the Government of the United States on this business of his making this demand; and assured Captain Bainbridge and me, that the United States would be highly pleased at the conduct of the consul and commandant in obliging the Dey and regency, agreeable to the request he made to us, as a favor from the United States. We observed to the Dey that this was a forced business; that, under this idea, and for the safety of his presents, it would be better that his flag should be hoisted at the fore-topgallant-mast-head than the main. The Dey declared he did not well know this business, but that those at the marine knew the custom; he believed it was at the main.

On this we went to the marine, told the general of the marine that if this United States' ship should haul down her pennant, and hoist the Algerine flag at the main, that said ship, agreeable to our laws, was out of commission, and would not be considered as a public ship of the United States; that the Algerine flag would be the same thing at the fore as the main, but to us it made great difference; that, by Christian laws, the ship would be considered as Algerine property, and not as a ship of the United States; that we made this remonstrance and observation to prevent difficulties. On this explanation, the general of marine got into a great passion; swore that the proposition and idea was made as an evasive pretence; that the ships of war of Spain and France, and other nations, had acquiesced to hoist the Algerine flag at the main; that it was by the flag being hoisted there, that the mission was known and announced at Algiers and Constantinople. I explained to you, sir, that it was the custom, as I have seen and known, that the French and Spanish ships of war going on the like mission, hoisted at Algiers and Constantinople the Algerine flag at the main; that at sea he wore his pennant, and was more his own master. On this, you observed, it being a forced business, that, if there was a right to acquiesce to one point, there was no alternative but by the same rule to acquiesce to the other relative to the flag.

The general of marine and officers of the same said, if there was not a compliance on this business, agreeable to customs of all nations heretofore, that there no longer existed friendship between this regency and the United States. I observed, that I was sorry that the United States had so much reason to know Algiers, and that Algiers had no reason to know the United States.

We went on board; the Turkish flag was hoisted at the main of the United States' ship, and was saluted with seven guns, as customary.

Painful is the detail, but it contains a narrative of facts. To the truth thereof, witness my hand and seal of office, at Algiers, this 9th day of October, 1800.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD O'BRIEN.

Extract of a letter from Richard O'Brien to the Secretary of State.

"ALGIERS, October 22, 1800.

"As the United States' ship Washington, Captain Bainbridge, has proceeded per force, in fact, to save the peace of the United States with Algiers; to prevent captivity and detention to the ship, officers, and crew, and prevent the pretence of a sudden war, and pillage and slavery to the citizens of the United States; I calculate that, if said ship goes and comes safe in five months, it will cost the United States forty thousand dollars. This, in comparison to what our losses might be if war, left me no time to hesitate in the choice of the evils and difficulties which presented fully in view: in surveying both sides of the coast, and how we should stand on both tacks, I found there was no alternative but to proceed.

"I have made no responsibility, as is customary with all nations, [with] the Dey and regency. I am convinced that, if an accident should happen to the Washington, in being captured by any nation, or by being driven on shore, as soon as this news would reach Algiers they would immediately send out their corsairs, and send in all American vessels they should meet with, in order to repay themselves for the amount of Algerine property on board the Washington. We submitted to it in the affair of the ship Fortune; and, if the amount in reality was six hundred thousand dollars, the regency would take to the amount of one million of dollars. It is their custom. Is not it a hard case for us to risk the ship and crew of the United States, and Algiers to force said ship, and, if any accident, to be liable to difficulties and calamities I have described?"

Extract of a letter from Mr. Cathcart to the Secretary of State.

"TRIPOLI, January 4, 1801.

"On the 2d instant, in the evening, the banners of Sweden, by the Bashaw's request, were hoisted upon the Danish house, and a temporary flag-staff was prepared, in order that the customary salute should be fired the next day. When a peace takes place with any nation, it is customary for the different consuls to congratulate the Bashaw on the event. You may judge with what a grace I performed a ceremony so repugnant to my feelings; but it was necessary. I accordingly waited upon his excellency, in company with the Danish consul, Swedish ex-consul, Mr. Bohrstrom, the present consul, and several others. After congratulation, perfumation, fumigation, and drinking of coffee and sherbet were over, commenced the following litigation: 'I have concluded a peace with the Swedes,' commenced the Bashaw; 'and I am certain that the King of Sweden is sensible that I was forced to declare war against his nation contrary to my inclination; for had my demands been satisfied in the first instance, I should not have captured their ships and enslaved their people. Some nations,' added he, (meaning the United States,) 'have used me very ill; they look upon me as nothing; they have recourse to Algiers for all things. I should be glad to know which is thought most of at Constantinople?' I could easily have solved that doubt, by saying that the Dey of Algiers had lately sent presents to the Grand Signior to the amount of a million of dollars, which were powerful arguments in his favor. But, as the conversation was general, I did not conceive it more incumbent on me to answer his prologue than any of the rest of the company; and, in fact, I could say nothing but what I have communicated already. The Bashaw, observing my silence, directed his discourse to me, and asked me if I understood the Arabic and Turkish languages. I answered that I had a trifling knowledge of them, but spoke them so miserably that I never used any of them, especially as his excellency and ministers all spoke Italian. 'Pray,' says the Bashaw, 'what was the present Dey of Algiers in the reign of Mahomed Bashaw?' I answered, that he was a person very much respected, in consequence of his being the cousin of Hassan Bashaw, but had no post whatever. 'And pray, what was Hassan Bashaw at that time?' First, he was bik ilharche of the marine, and afterwards was made prime minister and treasurer in Algiers, called the Hasnagi. The Bashaw turned up his nose with visible signs of contempt, and was going to proceed, when a person informed him that a piece of timber was not to be found in the whole regency large enough to make a flag-staff for the Swedes, unless they took one of the cruiser's spars. 'It is a difficult thing,' says the son of Ali Bashaw, 'to get a flag-staff put up when it once comes down. When the American flag-staff comes down, it will take a great deal of grease (meaning money) to get it up again. The Danish flag-staff is broke, I hear, and wants mending with a new one.' He smiled a ghastly grin, and said, 'After all, what is twenty thousand dollars a year for a Christian nation to pay that has such vast resources? Had I enough to live on, I would not trouble myself with cruisers, although my subjects always wish war, because it is to their advantage. How many raizes,' added he, 'have I that know the way to the great sea?' Admiral Morad answered, about twenty. There not being, I believe, one capable but himself, without his accompanying them, shows that the Bashaw and his officers pay no great regard to truth. 'Well,' replied his excellency, 'I will find them vessels. In Tripoli, consul, we are all hungry, and, if we are not provided for, we soon get sick and peevish.' As the Bashaw spoke in metaphors, I answered him in the same manner, by saying, that when the chief physician prescribed the medicine, I should have no objection to administer the dose; but until then I could say nothing on the subject. 'Take care,' answered the Bashaw, 'that the medicine does not come too late, and, if it comes in time, that it will be strong enough.'"

Extract of a letter from Richard O'Brien to the Secretary of State.

"ALGIERS, January 27, 1801.

"On the 21st instant arrived at Algiers, in twenty-three days from Constantinople, the United States' ship the George Washington, William Bainbridge, Esq., commander. The Grand Signior has detained the Algerine ambassador sent, and presents, until that the regency of Algiers complies with all his demands, and will have full submission to his orders.

"The presents and funds which were sent by the Washington certainly amounted to one and a half million of dollars. A Swede, with the Dey's nephew, arrived at Smyrna with five hundred thousand. This was, by the orders of the Captain Bashaw, deposited in the treasury of the Grand Signior at Smyrna. Another Swede, with the Algerine prime minister's nephew, with at least four hundred thousand dollars, ran on shore at the island of Candia. This money also has fallen into the possession of the Grand Signior. Add to this, that the hundred Turks who went in the Washington, and are detained at Constantinople, were chiefly the richest and first men of this regency. These considerations will certainly induce this regency to acquiesce in the demands of the Grand Signior.

"The Dey will make a haul to repay him for his present losses; I hope we shall not be the victims; we are nearly two and a half years in arrear; no funds; we have a valuable unguarded commerce in these seas; we are threatened by all Barbary: therefore, we should act with energy, make good our stipulations and annuities, have consular friends, (not to be depending on mercenary Jews,) and show force in this sea."

Extracts of a letter from Mr. O'Brien to Mr. Smith, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Lisbon.

ALGIERS, February 7, 1801.

"Even at this moment I shudder for fear of our valuable vessels and citizens in this sea; so much in arrears, no funds, no corsairs, and threatened by all the dogs of prey.

"Algiers, a pirate state, wants employment for the refractory and for their corsairs. The troubles of the Baltic will scare the Swedes and Danes into port; and we, in arrears, no oil in our lamps, no anchors and cables, no corsairs in this sea, we will be the victims: such, sir, are my present fears."

TRIPOLI, IN BARBARY, May 16, 1801.

"This evening (10th May,) at six, P. M. Hadgi Mahomude la Sore, the same that went to Algiers in the Hamdullah, came to the American house, and told me not to be alarmed, for the Bashaw had sent him to inform me that he declared war against the United States, and would take down our flag-staff on Thursday, the 14th instant; that, if I pleased to remain at Tripoli, I should be treated with respect, but, if I pleased, I might go away. I sent my compliments to the Bashaw, and informed him that it was my positive instructions not to remain an instant after a declaration of war took place, and that I should charter a vessel to-morrow, if possible.

"Thursday, 14th, at one, P. M. Hadgi Mahomude la Sore came to inform me that the chavux were coming to take our flag-staff down. I waited until the Seraskier arrived, and then sent said la Sore to offer him ten thousand dollars, in addition to what I had already offered, which was rejected by the Bashaw; and orders given to cut away the flag-staff.

"At a quarter past two they effected the grand achievement, and our flag-staff was chopped down six feet from the ground, and left reclining on the terrace. Thus ends the first act of this tragedy. I hope the catastrophe may be happy."

TUNIS, December 8, 1800.

"On the 25th ult. after having despatched duplicates of my letter from the 1st to the 16th, it was intimated to me that there was an American ship in the road of Porto Farino. Instantly I sent off an express to inquire for facts. On the 27th, I received a note from Captain Coffin, of the Anna Maria, informing me that he had been ten days in the road, without being able to communicate with the shore, by reason of the weather, which was extremely bad. On the 28th, I asked a boat of the Bey to board her, which he said should be ready on the 30th. Accordingly, on the 30th, I embarked at Tunis in an open boat, and arrived on board, ten leagues, at eight in the evening of the same day. On the morning following, the 1st December, I had the honor of receiving your letter of the 30th August, covering an invoice and bills of the ship's lading. Yesterday I returned to Tunis. Such part of the cargo as was between decks was chiefly discharged before I left the ship. The quality of the articles is acknowledged to be good, but it is objected that the plank and the oars are too short, and the Government affect to be dissatisfied that the keels, guns, and powder are not come forward. I believe the fact to be, the Government is dissatisfied that any thing is come forward. If this opinion requires evidence, I consider it sufficient to state that the United States are the only nation which have, at this moment, a rich unguarded commerce in the Mediterranean, and that the Barbary regencies are pirates. I take to myself the merit of having once more at least suspended an expedition which was prepared for us; but we are yet deficient, and I am not without apprehension that this deficiency will be resorted [to] as a pretext for surprising our merchantmen; in which case, they might do us incalculable mischief. These are considerations, which, it is supposed, should compel exertions to fulfil our obligations with this regency.

"The immense concessions he has received, the summer past, from Spain, Denmark, Sicily, Sweden, have so diminished the condition of our peace in his eye, that he says, 'it is a trifle for so great a commercial nation, in consideration for the advantages of a free trade in this sea.'"

To all whom it doth or may concern:

Know ye, by these presents, that I, James Leander Cathcart, agent and consul for the United States of America, in and for the city and regency of Tripoli, in Barbary, finding just cause to complain of Jusef Bashaw, supreme commandant of said city and regency of Tripoli, and his ministers, towards the Government and citizens of the United States of America, and conceiving it my duty to protest against such conduct: now know ye, that I do hereby protest against the said Jusef Bashaw, supreme commandant of said city and regency, and against his ministers and counsellors, in behalf of the Government of the United States of America, myself, and fellow-citizens, for the following reasons, viz:

First. Be it known, that, on the 17th of August, 1799, said Jusef Bashaw, supreme commandant of the regency of Tripoli, at the instigation of Morad Raiz, admiral of the cruisers of this regency, refused to receive the printed passports, issued by the consul of the United States of America in this regency, in obedience to his orders from Government, thereby claiming a superiority or preference to the regencies of Algiers and Tunis, he being duly informed that the said passports were accepted in the same form by the chiefs of said regencies, and in order, as is my firm belief, to have a pretext to send the merchant vessels, belonging to the citizens of the United States, into this port for examination, said Admiral Morad having publicly declared that he would go to sea, with the vessels under his command, without any passport from this office, if they were not modified to his liking, and worded similar to the passports of the British; and the said Jusef Bashaw, on application being made by the said consul of the United States, refusing to exert his authority, is a clear and sufficient evidence that he was accessory to the insolent demand of said Morad, or, more properly speaking, that said Morad acted, if not by his orders, at least with his tacit consent, thereby forcing the said consul of the United States to deviate from his instructions, and to submit, from imperious necessity, to a humiliation incompatible with the honor and dignity of the nation he has the honor to represent.

Second. Be it known, that, in the month of October, 1799, James Leander Cathcart, consul for the United States of America, in this regency, having received several bales of cloth to dispose of, said Jusef Bashaw sent the broker, Leon Farfara, to the consular house, requesting said consul to give him the preference in the sale of said cloth, promising to pay for the same like any other individual, and as cloths were sold of the same quality. I, knowing how he had served the late Venetian and Swedish consuls on a similar occasion, sent said Leon Farfara to inform him that the cloth was not mine, and that I expected to be paid immediately, in order to be enabled to make a remittance to my correspondent, which he, the said Bashaw, promised to do. I, therefore, confiding in his promise, which I was taught to believe was sacred to all true Mussulmen, and more especially to a Prince of the august family of Caramanly, did deliver unto him sundry pieces of cloth, to the value of five thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven yuslicks, current coin of this regency; which, at that time, was worth in Spanish dollars two thousand three hundred and fourteen and eighty cents, two yuslicks and one-half being then equal to one dollar silver; but, at present, the coin of this regency having depreciated, owing to the great quantity of alloy mixed in the coinage, a dollar passes for three yuslicks, which makes a difference of one-fifth part, or twenty per cent.; that I have repeatedly demanded the above sum, and have always been put off, from time to time, with promises, until the 22d day of September, 1800, when, some oil belonging to said Bashaw being selling at public vendue, I sent my dragoman to purchase a barrel for the use of my house, value about eighteen dollars, which the hasnador refused to give unto him, unless I sent the money to pay for it first. I sent the dragoman immediately to the Bashaw to know the reason, who repeated the same words, saying the oil was not his, but belonged to the crew of the cruisers; that, if I wanted oil, I must first send the cash. I immediately sent for Farfara, who had acted as broker in the sale of the cloth, and desired him to demand a positive answer from the Bashaw, whether he intended to pay me or not; that I was resolved to be kept no longer in suspense; and offered to take the money at the present value, which is only one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine dollars, in full of all demands. The Bashaw sent the same answer which he had sent above fifty times before, that he would pay me, but at present it was not convenient; and desired Leon Farfara to inform me, that, if I had a mind, I might take one of the Swedish prizes for my money, which I declined; knowing that he, having a quantity of prizes and other goods on hand for exportation, would probably force me to take a cargo of said goods to Leghorn, or elsewhere, thereby exposing the United States to become responsible for said goods, or their value, should any accident happen to said vessel, in the same manner as the claim originated upon Sweden, which was the first and principal cause of the present war. I therefore have deemed it more expedient to entirely lose the aforementioned sum than to run a risk which might involve my country in a war.

And as it appears from the above detail that the said Bashaw never intends to pay me the above sum in cash, according to agreement, notwithstanding I have his receipt or promissory note, under the great seal of this regency, and I having waited above one year for the payment of the said sum, without effect, I therefore debit the United States the said sum in my account current, leaving the Government of the said United States to make the said claim a national claim; no individual being bound to be responsible for the arbitrary acts of the chiefs of the Barbary States; at the same time making myself responsible to the United States for said sum, or any part thereof, which may be recovered from the said Jusef Bashaw hereafter.

Third. Be it known, that, in the months of May, September, and October, 1800, the said Jusef Bashaw, supreme commandant of the said regency of Tripoli, having made certain demands upon the United States, in direct violation of the tenth article of the treaty existing between the United States of America and the regency of Tripoli, which the consul of the United States resident here found incompatible with the honor and interest of the nation he represents to comply with; that said Jusef Bashaw, in direct violation of the twelfth article of the said existing treaty, did publicly declare that he would only wait until he receives answers from the President of the United States of America, which, if not satisfactory, that he would then declare war against the said United States, as is more fully explained in my despatches to Government, copies of which were forwarded to our consuls at Algiers and Tunis. And whereas it is particularly specified in the tenth article of said treaty that the money and presents demanded by the Bey or Bashaw of Tripoli is a full and satisfactory consideration on his part, and on the part of his subjects, for said treaty of perpetual peace and friendship, and that no pretence of any periodical tribute or further payment is ever to be made by either party; and said Bashaw of Tripoli having acknowledged the receipt of the money and presents stipulated by said treaty, I find myself justifiable, both to God and my country, in having refused to comply with the said Bashaw's unjust demands upon said United States of America.

And whereas, it is stipulated in the twelfth article of the aforesaid treaty, that, in case any dispute arises from a violation of any of the articles of said treaty, no appeal shall be made to arms, nor shall war be declared on any pretence whatever; but if the consul residing at the place where the dispute shall happen shall not be able to settle the same, an amicable reference shall be made to the mutual friend of both parties, the Dey of Algiers; the parties thereby engaging to abide by his decision: and he, by virtue of his signature to the said treaty, having engaged, for himself and his successors, to declare the justice of the case according to the true interpretation of the said treaty, and use all the means in his power to enforce the observance of the same:

Now know all men by these presents, that I, James Leander Cathcart, consul for the United States of America in said regency of Tripoli, do protest and declare, that the demands made by the Bashaw of Tripoli upon the United States of America are of such a nature that I cannot settle the dispute arising therefrom; and that I conceive that I should not only be deviating from my official duty, but likewise acting as an accomplice, and in conjunction with the said Bashaw of Tripoli, to treat our good friends, the Dey and Divan of Algiers, with indignity and disrespect, were I to refrain from making the aforesaid amicable reference. I, therefore, in virtue of these presents, do make the aforesaid amicable reference, transmitting the whole to the consul general of the United States of America at Algiers, who is possessed of every information relative to the state of our affairs in this regency, having received duplicates of my despatches for the Government of the United States; at the same time, leaving it at the discretion of the consul general of the United States at Algiers, for the time being, to take such measures as he in his judgment may think most likely to promote the interests of the United States, and to maintain the peace of our country with this regency upon honorable and equitable terms.

Fourth. Be it known, that, on the 25th of September, 1800, Raiz Amor Shelli, commander of a Tripolitan cruiser of eighteen guns, captured the American brig Catharine, James Carpenter, master, of and from New York, and bound to Leghorn, valued at fifty thousand dollars, or thereabouts; that said vessel was kept in possession of the subjects of Tripoli until the 15th of October, in the evening, and was then delivered up to the consul of the United States, in consequence of the Bashaw of Tripoli having written a letter to the President of the United States, the purport of which, being already known, needs no repetition; and that said vessel was exposed to much loss and peril, as appears by the master of said brig his protest, already forwarded to our consul general at Algiers; and that said brig was plundered of effects, valued by said master, James Carpenter, at three hundred and ninety-seven hard dollars, whereof was recovered to the value of one hundred and eighty dollars, the value of two hundred and seventeen dollars being irrecoverably lost; notwithstanding he the Bashaw had given positive orders to Hamet Raiz, or Minister of Marine, to cause every article that could be found to be restored to their lawful owner; yet said Raiz of the Marine did not comply with the Bashaw's orders; and, being the Bashaw's brother-in-law, it was out of my power to compel him; but, on the contrary, prevaricated, from day to day, from the 16th to the 21st of October, with an intent, no doubt, to share the spoils with the aforesaid Raiz Amor Shelli; and, on the night of the 21st instant, sent Ibram Farfara to inform me that, if the brig did not sail by daylight in the morning, the port would be embargoed: and gave me to understand that, if I did not promise to pay him anchorage for said brig, she would be detained until the embargo should be taken off. This demand I absolutely refused to comply with. On the 22d, at daylight, I ordered the brig to get under way, and could not get the pilot to go on board until said Ibram Farfara paid the Raiz of Marine five dollars and seventy-five cents anchorage, which, notwithstanding it being an unjust demand, I complied with, sooner than have the brig detained one day longer.

I therefore, for foresaid reasons, and for each of the aforementioned arbitrary acts, do protest against the aforesaid Jusef Bashaw, supreme commandant of the regency of Tripoli, in Barbary, and against his ministers and counsellors; but more especially against said Morad Raiz, admiral of the cruisers of this regency, for being the cause of my altering the national passports of the United States of America, and against said Hamet Raiz, or Minister of Maine, for the reasons before mentioned, as well as for falsely, insidiously, and slanderously asserting in my presence, and in the presence of Captain Carpenter, that the consul general of the United States, Richard O'Brien, and the broker or banker of said United States, Micaiah Cohen Bacri, had informed him, when he was last at Algiers, that the Government of the United States had alone paid to the house of Bacri & Co. one hundred thousand dollars for their influence, thereby irritating the said Jusef Bashaw against the Government and citizens of the United States of America, as the said Jusef Bashaw seemingly gave credit to the falsehood of said Hamet Raiz, and emphatically said that the Government of the United States had treated an Algerine Jew better, and with more liberality, than they had the said Bashaw of Tripoli, notwithstanding I gave the direct lie without ceremony or hesitation to the said Hamet, and told the Bashaw that I wondered how he could give credit to so barefaced a falsehood; for even had the United States given the abovementioned sum, the party concerned would be the last people in the world to divulge the same, it not comporting with their honor or interest, especially to Hamet Raiz, who was not only an enemy to the United States, but likewise to his excellency the Bashaw of Tripoli, he having by his false insinuations endeavored to persuade the Bashaw to annul the treaty of peace and amity at present subsisting between the said United States and this regency, to the prejudice of his character, honor and dignity, whose word and signature I had always supposed to have been inviolably sacred; and that said Jusef Bashaw, in answer to the above, said, "You say that Hamet Raiz lies, and I say he tells truth;" thereby discrediting all I had said, and giving full credit to the imposition of said Hamet Raiz, or Minister of Marine.

Now know all men, that, for the reasons afore assigned, I, James Leander Cathcart, agent and consul for the United States of America, in the regency of Tripoli, having shown sufficient cause to enter this protest against the said Jusef Bashaw, supreme commandant of the regency of Tripoli, his aforementioned ministers and counsellors, I do, by these presents, most solemnly protest against the conduct of said Jusef Bashaw, his ministers and counsellors, as being unjust and in direct violation of the 10th and 12th articles of the existing treaty between the United States and the said regency of Tripoli; and I, James Leander Cathcart, do further declare that the dispute arising from the violation of said treaty is of such a nature, that I cannot adjust the same before I receive express instructions from the President of the United States of America, or until our good friends the Dey and Divan of Algiers shall decide upon the justice of the cause, according to the true interpretation of the existing treaty between the United States of America and this regency; and that I do hereby make an amicable reference to our good friends the Dey and Divan of the regency of Algiers, promising, in the name of the United States of America, to abide by their decision agreeable to the true meaning of the stipulation contained in the 12th article of the treaty of peace and amity concluded between the United States of America and the regency of Tripoli, by the intervention of the late Hassan Bashaw, Dey of Algiers, and under the immediate guaranty of said regency; the said treaty having been duly ratified by the reigning Dey of Algiers, Mustapha Bashaw, whom God preserve.

Now I, James Leander Cathcart, agent and consul of the United States of America, conceiving it my duty so to do, do now transmit this said protest to the chancery of the United States at Tunis, in order that it may be there duly registered, and from thence forwarded to the consul general of the United States of America at Algiers, in order to prevent, as much as depends upon me, any appeal being made to arms, leaving the conducting of the whole affair entirely at the discretion of the consul general of the United States of America for the time being, as before mentioned, not doubting but he will take such measures as he in his judgment may think most likely to promote the interests of the United States of America, and maintain the peace of our country with this regency upon honorable and equitable terms.

In testimony of the above, I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed the seal of my office, at the chancery of the United States of America, in the city of Tripoli, in Barbary, this 29th day of October, in the [L. S.] year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred, and in the 25th year of the independence of the United States of America.

JAMES L. CATHCART.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mr. Cathcart having desired a procès verbal of what passed at the audience, which, at his request, in conjunction with that of the consul of His Danish Majesty, and of the chargé des affaires of His Catholic Majesty, was given on the 11th of this month; as well as of the reasons which occasioned their request:

The undersigned Nicholai Christian Nisen, consul of His Danish Majesty, and Don Pedro Ortiz de Zugasti, chargé des affaires of His Catholic Majesty, attest and declare as follows:

Since a long time there existed the greatest irregularity in the distribution of letters which arrived here for the consuls. This irregularity was considerably increased, when, by reason of the plague which appeared at Tunis, and the precautions relative to health taken by his excellency the Bashaw, in consequence, the couriers were subjected to quarantine, and the letters fumigated before they were distributed. But the abuses had now reached their last extreme. On the 27th October, arrived a small vessel from the coast of Tunis: the vessel and passengers were both subjected to quarantine. Only one letter was delivered on the day of her arrival; and on our earnestly endeavoring to learn whether there were any for us, we received negative answers. Nevertheless, on the 9th of this month a packet was given to the chargé des affaires of His Catholic Majesty, and another to the consul of the United States of America; the latter having had the politeness to communicate some news from it to us, complained of the considerable delay he had experienced of a letter he had just received from Algiers, dated on the 25th July, contained in another from Tunis of the 1st of October. This letter was of the greatest consequence to him in his consular concerns, and he requested us to attest the day of its arrival, which we did, as we now do by these presents.

The next day (Nov. 10,) arrived a courier from Tunis. He arrived in the morning, but all the day passed without receiving the letters. On the 11th, in the morning, they were landed open, and thrown together promiscuously, and, instead of fumigating them, they were burnt in such a manner as to consume a part and render the rest illegible, and thus they were sent to us by handfulls. Seeing these unworthy proceedings, finding many of our letters lost, and that our residence here at Tripoli would be absolutely useless to our Governments, if their orders did not reach us, we thought it our duty to make a complaint, supported by all, and in the strongest manner, to his excellency the Bashaw. An audience being granted, we showed him our letters in pieces and burnt, among which there was one for the Bashaw himself. His excellency immediately promised to cause this abuse to be redressed. He gave his orders, in consequence, and declared himself ready to punish the guilty.

After having thus terminated the principal object of the audience requested, each of us communicated to his excellency the news we had received; and the consul of the United States of America, having equally communicated to the Bashaw, that the ministers of his Government at Paris had just concluded a treaty with the French republic, which was to terminate their differences, his excellency complimented him on the occasion, but nevertheless added, that an arrangement ought also to be made with him, and to take care that he did not give orders to his cruisers to bring in the merchant vessels of the United States; and his excellency the Bashaw further explained himself in such manner as to cause the fear of a rupture not far off. The consul of the United States of America, Mr. Cathcart, answered, that he was sure that would never take place; that the word of his excellency was sacred; that he, the consul, could do nothing without the orders of his Government, and that his excellency had promised to wait, not only six months, computing from the 2d of October last, but until the arrival of an answer from the American Government. But the Bashaw did not seem to accede to it; on the contrary, he refused, and said that he had the greatest reason to complain of the Americans; that lately he had received a letter from one of his corsairs, which acquainted him that, being on the coast of Naples, he had met an American polacre richly laden; that he visited and treated it in a friendly manner; that, nevertheless, the polacre, after entering the port, gave intelligence that the corsair was there, in order that a superior force might be sent out to capture him; but the corsair being advised of it by a Ragusan vessel, which had just come out of the same port, he had time to save himself.

Mr. Cathcart answered his excellency that it was evidently a false report, dictated by malice; that, among the whole marine of the United States, there was no polacre; and that he prayed his excellency not to give credit to such lies, which his Raiz might report; nevertheless, the consul of the United States had no reason to be tranquillized: it appeared, on the contrary, that his excellency the Bashaw of Tripoli intended shortly to give orders for bringing in the merchant vessels of the United States, and thus to commence hostilities.

The audience being finished, we retired, and Mr. Cathcart, consul of the United States of America, having communicated his wish to us, to have a procès verbal of all that passed at the audience, as well as of what gave occasion for asking it, we have drawn up these presents; and in faith thereof, we have signed them, and thereto affixed the royal seals of our consulates.

Done at Tripoli, in Barbary, this 13th November, 1801.

N. C. NISEN. [L. S.]
Consul of His Danish Majesty, at Tripoli, in Barbary.

In absence of the Consul General:
[L. S.] PEDRO ORTIZ DE ZUGASTI.

DECEMBER 22, 1801.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I now enclose sundry documents supplementary to those communicated to you with my message at the commencement of the session. Two others of considerable importance, the one relating to our transactions with the Barbary Powers, the other presenting a view of the offices of the Government, shall be communicated as soon as they can be completed.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The Bashaw of Tunis to Mr. John Adams, President of the United States of America.

MR. PRESIDENT:

Although I have charged the worthy and zealous consul of your nation, the Sieur William Eaton, to acquaint you with a proposition, which I have found myself under the absolute necessity of making to him, I have nevertheless determined to apply directly to you about it by these presents, in order that I might, at the same time, procure for myself the pleasure of reiterating to you the assurance of the continuance of my esteem and my friendship.

After the request I formerly made for forty cannon of different calibers, the present circumstances in which I find myself require that I should procure twenty-four pounders, of which I have the most pressing need. I should therefore wish that you would cause them to be sent to me as soon as possible: in case you should not, on the receipt of the present, have sent the first to me, if finally they should have been already sent away, I expect, Mr. President, as a real proof of your friendship, for which I shall be infinitely obliged to you, that you will furnish and convey to me forty other pieces, all of the caliber abovementioned.

This request will not appear in the least extraordinary to you, when you consider the very moderate and friendly manner in which, differently from others, I have conducted myself towards the United States and their flag, notwithstanding that the douceurs and presents, stipulated four years ago for my making peace with the United States, have not all arrived, and that not the smallest part of those, which were intended for me individually, have been sent. I make no doubt on this subject, that your consul will have forwarded the letter I addressed to you about two years past relative to it, and that you will thereby have seen that I consented to wait the space of a year, in consequence of the representation which the same consul made to me, that several of the articles composing the present due to me, and which I constantly expect, could neither be had nor manufactured in the United States, and that they were to be procured from foreign countries.

Wishing, on my part, to return you a reciprocity (whenever an occasion of urgency in your nation happens) in my country, and hoping to see that good harmony which happily subsists between us continued and remain undisturbed, I pray Almighty God to preserve you, and I assure you, Mr. President, of my esteem and my most distinguished consideration.

[Signature and seal of Hamouda Bashaw, Bey of Tunis.]

At Bardo, of Tunis, the 2d of the moon Haggia, of the year Hegira 1215, and the 15th April, 1801.

Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, to Hamouda Bashaw, Bey of Tunis.

GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND:

The letter which you addressed to the President of the United States of America, on the 15th of April, has been received, and has conveyed us the assurances, always welcome, that your friendly dispositions towards these States still continue firm and unimpaired. We feel deep regret that the regalia, and other tokens of our esteem for you, had not, at that date, reached their destination. These delays proceed from the distance of our situation, and from the circumstance that some of the articles acceptable to you are not fabricated here, but are to be sought for in foreign countries, where, also, they require time to be prepared. We trust they will all have been received before this reaches you. We are a nation not practising the difficult arts, but employed in agriculture, and transportation of its produce, for commercial exchange with others. Peace, therefore, with all nations is essentially our pursuit, so long as it can be obtained on just and equal grounds. Of this desire, on our part, we have given to the States bordering on the Mediterranean the same manifestations of which Europe had set the example. Like them, we consented to give a price for friendship, which would have been properly requited by our own. So long as we have been met with moderation and good faith, we have preferred these means of peace, rather than to seek it through our own strength. At length, however, the inadmissible demands of the Bashaw of Tripoli, and our determination to owe to our own energies, and not to dishonorable condescensions, the protection of our right to navigate the ocean freely, have induced us to send a squadron into the Mediterranean sea, for the protection of our commerce against the Bashaw of Tripoli. We gave, illustrious friend, in strict charge to our officer, chief in command, to respect and treat with particular friendship your flags, your vessels, and your subjects, and to take an early occasion, after his arrival in those seas, to testify his respect to you, to assure you of our adherence to the peace and friendship established with you, and of our orders to him to cultivate them with assiduity: and we trusted you would yield him that hospitable reception, and those accommodations in the ports of your dominions which his necessities require. We did this with the greater confidence, as knowing the liberality of your mind, and being ourselves in the habit of rendering similar good offices to all nations in friendship with us.

Trusting, good friend, that our consul will have received and delivered those evidences of our good will, which circumstances permit us to offer for your acceptance, we ask the continuance of your friendship in return for that which we sincerely bear to you: and pray to God that he may long preserve your life, and have you under the safeguard of his holy keeping.

Done in the United States of America, this 9th day of September, 1801.

TH: JEFFERSON.

TUNIS, June 28, 1801.

SIR:

On the night of the 18th instant a fire broke out in the Bey's palace, which, in its progress, consumed fifty thousand stands of arms. The second day following, I received a message to wait on the Bey, but was at that moment confined to my bed with a bilious fever, so that it was not till this morning I have been able to go in my carriage to the palace. The Bey's object in calling on me was to demand of the United States ten thousand stands of arms. I refused to state his demand. "I have proportioned my loss," said he, "among my friends, and this falls to you to furnish. Tell your Government to send them without delay." It is impossible, said I, to state this claim to my Government. We have no magazines of small arms; the organization of our national strength is different from that of any other nation on earth. Each citizen carries his own arms, always ready for battle. When threatened with an invasion, or actually invaded, detachments from the whole national body are sent, by rotation, to serve in the field; so that we have no need of standing armies, nor depositories of arms. It would be an affront to my Government, and an imposition on the Bey, to state to them this demand, or to flatter him with a prospect of receiving it. "Send for them to France or England," said the minister. You are in a much more eligible position to make this commission to Europe than we are, said I. "If the Bey had any intention of purchasing the arms from Europe," said the minister, "he could do it without your agency. He did not send for you to ask your advice, but to order you to communicate his demands to your Government." And I came here, said I, to assure you that I will make no such communication to my Government. "The Bey will write himself," said he. If so, it will become my duty to forward his letter; but, at the same time, it is equally obligatory on me to let the Bey be aforehand apprized that he never will receive a single musket from the United States. I should suppose a sense of decency, if not of gratitude, would dissuade the Bey from this new extravagant claim. Has he not, within eighteen months, received two large ship cargoes in regalia? have we not now another ship laden for him on its passage? and has he not, within sixty days, demanded cannon extraordinary of the United States? At this rate, when are our payments to have an end? "Never," said the minister; "as to the ships you talk of, they are but the part payment of regalia you have long since owed us, as the condition of peace; the other claims we make are such as we receive from all friendly nations once every two or three years; it is an established custom, and you, like others, will be obliged to conform to it." When we shall have completed the payment of our peace stipulations, you may never calculate on further donations. It is by treaty considered as the conditions of a perpetual peace, and any new claims on your part will be at least an infraction of the treaty, and will be so considered by us. You may, therefore, at once, and forever, abandon the idea of future claims: for I again assure you, in the name of my Government and country, that the discharge of our treaty obligations will put an end to our contributions here. "Your contributions, as you think proper to call them," said the minister, will never have an end. If this be the language you think of holding at this court, you may prepare yourself to leave the country, and that very soon." If change of style, on my part, said I, be the condition of residence here, I will leave the Bey's kingdom to-morrow morning. "We will give you a month," said the minister. I ask but six hours, I replied. "But you will write?" No. "But it is your duty to write." For deficiency in duty this is not the place where I am to be questioned. "I tell you again," continued he, "your peace depends on your compliance with this demand of my master." If so, said I, on me be the responsibility of breaking the peace. I wish you a good morning. Leaving the place, I heard the minister say to one of his colleagues, "By God, that man is mad! but we shall bring him to terms; never fear." I do not know how this affair will end. I will not change my position.

I have the honor to be, sir, with perfect respect, your most obedient servant,

WILLIAM EATON.

Hon. SECRETARY of the United States.

Extract of a Letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Dale.

MAY 20, 1801.

"Recent accounts received from the consul of the United States, employed near the regencies of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, give cause to fear that they will attack our commerce, if unprotected, within the Mediterranean; but, particularly, such apprehension is justified by absolute threats on the part of the Bey of Tripoli.

"Under such circumstances, it is thought probable that a small squadron of well appointed frigates appearing before their ports will have a tendency to prevent their breaking the peace which has been made, and which has subsisted for some years, between them and the United States. It is also thought that such a squadron, commanded by some of our most gallant officers, known to be stationed in the Mediterranean, will give confidence to our merchants, and tend greatly to increase the commerce of the country within those seas.

"I am, therefore, instructed by the President to direct that you proceed, with all possible expedition, with the squadron under your command, to the Mediterranean. It will be proper for you to stop at Gibraltar, and obtain permission from the Governor for depositing provisions there, for the use of your squadron. It is not presumed there will be any refusal; but should he deem it improper, you will then leave a letter with Mr. Gavino, the American consul, for the captain of the provision vessel that will be sent hereafter, directing him where to proceed.

"On your arrival at Gibraltar, you will be able to ascertain whether all or any of the Barbary Powers shall have declared war against the United States. In case all are tranquil, you will water your ships, proceed off the port of Algiers, and send to the consul, Mr. O'Brien, whom you will inform that you have arrived; that the views of your Government are perfectly friendly; that you have a letter for him and the Dey; and that you request to see him, or that he send some person, in whom he can confide, for the letters; or that he send a permission for one of your officers to go to the city. You will have on board certain goods, which you will deliver on his requisition. They are for the biennial presents to the regency. The George Washington is preparing to carry timber and other stores for at least one year's annuity, and you have on board the President thirty thousand dollars, which it is hoped and expected Mr. O'Brien will be able to induce the regency to receive for another year. The balance may go some time hence. But if Mr. O'Brien cannot induce the Dey to receive money instead of stores, you will retain the thirty thousand dollars, excepting four or five thousand dollars, which, on Mr. O'Brien's requisition, may (if he should think it useful to commence with) be given him on your arrival, and which amount may be replaced, if the Dey shall afterwards agree to receive the thirty thousand dollars in full for one year's annuity, out of the ten thousand dollars hereafter mentioned as being intended for the Bey of Tripoli, and the stores will be sent as soon as possible.

"When your business is arranged at Algiers, to your satisfaction, you will proceed to Tunis, and there cause the letters you carry to be delivered to Mr. Eaton, the consul. A ship is preparing, and will sail as soon as possible, with stores, agreeably to treaty with that regency.

"From thence you will proceed to Tripoli; on your arrival there, send for Mr. Cathcart, American consul for that port, to whom deliver his letters, and either by him or one of your officers (whoever may be deemed most proper,) send the President's letter to the Bey. You have on board ten thousand dollars, as a present from the President; the whole, or such part thereof as you may have on your arrival at Tripoli, and which Mr. Cathcart may conceive useful, will be given the Bey, provided he has conducted himself peaceably towards the United States.

"You will be careful not to solicit the honor of a salute from any of those Powers; if you do, they will exact a barrel of powder for every gun they fire.

"You will enjoin upon your officers and men the propriety and utility of a proper conduct towards the subjects of all those Powers; a good understanding with them being extremely desirable.

"Should you find the conduct of the Bey of Tripoli such as you may confide in, you will then coast with your squadron the Egyptian and Syrian shores as far as Smyrna, and return by the mouth of the Adriatic; thence pay the Bey of Tripoli another visit; finding him tranquil, proceed to Tunis, and again show your ships; and thence coast the Italian shore to Leghorn, where you may stay some days, and then proceed along the Genoese to Toulon, which port it will be instructive to your young men to visit. From thence, proceed again to Algiers. If there should be no hostile appearance on the part of those Powers, and you should be well assured that no danger is to be apprehended from either of them, you may, on the 15th October, commence your return homeward; but if there should be any cause for apprehension from either of those Powers, you must place your ships in a situation to chastise them, in case of their declaring war or committing hostilities, and not commence your return to the United States until the first day of December.

"On your return, you will go into Hampton Road, and repair yourself to this place as soon as you can. Order the Philadelphia to Philadelphia, if the season will permit; if not, let her go with the Essex to New York; the Enterprise send to Baltimore.

"But should you find, on your arrival at Gibraltar, that all the Barbary Powers have declared war against the United States, you will then distribute your force in such a manner as your judgment shall direct, so as best to protect our commerce and chastise their insolence; by sinking, burning, or destroying their ships and vessels wherever you shall find them. The better to enable you to form a just determination, you are herewith furnished with a correct state of the strength and situation of each of the Barbary Powers. The principal strength, you will see, is that of Algiers. The force of Tunis and Tripoli is contemptible, and might be crushed with any one of the frigates under your command.

"Should Algiers alone have declared war against the United States, you will cruise off that port so as effectually to prevent any thing from going in or coming out, and you will sink, burn, or otherwise destroy their ships and vessels wherever you find them.

"Should the Bey of Tripoli have declared war, (as he has threatened) against the United States, you will then proceed direct to that port, where you will lay your ship in such a position as effectually to prevent any of their vessels from going in or out. The Essex and Enterprise, by cruising well on towards Tunis, will have it in their power to intercept any vessels which they may have captured. By disguising your ships, it will be some weeks before they will know that the squadron is cruising in the Mediterranean, and give you a fair chance of punishing them.

"If Tunis alone, or in concert with Tripoli, should have declared war against the United States, you will chastise them in like manner. By cruising with the squadron, from the small island of Maratimo, near the island of Sicily, to Cape Blanco, on the Barbary shore, you may effectually prevent the corsairs of either from intercepting our commerce in the material part of the Mediterranean sea, and may intercept any prizes they may have made.

"Any prisoners you may take you will treat with humanity and attention, and land them on any part of the Barbary shore most convenient to you. This mode will be humane, and will show that we have no sort of fear what such men can do. It will also tend to bring those Powers back to a sense of justice which they owe to us. But you will be careful to select from them such Christians as may be on board, whom you will treat kindly, and land, when convenient, on some Christian shore. Should you have occasion, you may accept their services."

Extract of a letter from Commodore Dale, commanding the United States' squadron in the Mediterranean, to the Secretary of the Navy.

"GIBRALTAR BAY, July 2, 1801.

"On my arrival here, I found lying at anchor the high admiral of Tripoli, in a ship mounting twenty-six guns, nine and six pounders, two hundred and sixty men, and a brig of sixteen guns, one hundred and sixty men. He has been out thirty-six days, says he is not at war with America, nor has he taken any thing. He came in here for water, and is under quarantine at present. From every information I can get here, Tripoli is at war with America."

Extract of a letter from Commodore Dale to the Secretary of the Navy.

"TUNIS BAY, July 19, 1801.

"Mr. O'Brien informed me 'that the Dey of Algiers had been complaining very much of the United States in not making their annual payments good, and had gone so far as to say that he would not put up with it much longer. He was now confident, he said, that the Dey would not speak so big, and had no doubt that the arrival of the President at Algiers had much more weight with the Dey than if the Washington had arrived with stores. He did not think it a proper time to mention to the Dey about receiving thirty thousand dollars instead of stores.' Mr. O'Brien took the cloth and linen on shore with him.

"I arrived in Tunis Bay 17th instant, and sent a letter on shore to Mr. Eaton; the 18th he came on board. The Essex and the ship Grand Turk arrived the same day. From Mr. Eaton's information, this regency has been much in the same way as Algiers, and the appearance of our ships will have the same effect on the great and mighty Bey of Tunis."

Extract of a letter from Commodore Dale to the Secretary of the Navy.

"MALTA HARBOR, August 18, 1801.

"I arrived off Tripoli the 24th ultimo; the 25th I received a letter from Mr. Nessen, consul for Denmark at Tripoli; he was requested by Mr. Cathcart to act for him in his absence, should there be a necessity for it. The letter was written at the request of the Bey, to know if my intentions in coming off Tripoli were to make peace or war. I wrote him that my intentions in the first instance were friendly, but the act of his excellency in declaring war against the United States had put that disposition out of my power, and that I was determined to take his vessels of every description, and his subjects, wherever I could find them; but, at the same time, I should be glad to know his reasons for declaring war, and on what principles he expected to make peace. That on those points I wished information as soon as possible, that I might inform the President of the United States, and ascertain his determination respecting the business. The next day the Bey sent off a Jew, to negotiate for a peace or truce. I informed him that his excellency had not answered my letter; that I was not empowered to make a new treaty; but if the Bey would answer my letter, and send off one of his officers, and was serious in the business, I would then treat with him about a truce. The Jew went on shore. I have not heard from him since. The Bey wrote me previous to this, that he had good reasons for declaring war against the United States, but if I would come on shore, he was very certain we should be able to make a peace. He said he did not like the first and twelfth articles in the old treaty, and did not wish to have any thing to do with the Dey of Algiers.

"I am happy to inform you that the Enterprise, on the 1st instant, on her passage to this place, fell in with a polacre ship, mounting fourteen guns and eighty men, a corsair belonging to Tripoli. The enclosed is a copy of Mr. Sterrett's letter to me, which will give you an account of the action and the result of it. Mr. Sterrett is a very good officer, and deserves well of his country. After being eighteen days off Tripoli, and seeing nothing in that time but two small vessels, Tunisians, one bound in and the other out, and receiving information that the Bey had boats stationed along the coast, both to the eastward and westward, on the 11th instant I determined to run along the coast to the westward as far as the island of Pidussa; from Pidussa to this place for water. I arrived here the 16th instant; saw nothing on my passage."

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Andrew Sterrett to Commodore Dale, dated on board the United States' schooner Enterprise.

AT SEA, August 6, 1801.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that on the 1st August I fell in with a Tripolitan ship of war, called the Tripoli, mounting fourteen guns, commanded by Raiz Mahomet Sous. An action immediately commenced within pistol shot, which continued three hours, incessant firing. She then struck her colors. The carnage on board was dreadful, she having twenty men killed and thirty wounded; among the latter was the captain and first lieutenant. Her mizen-mast went over the side. Agreeable to your orders, I dismantled her of every thing but an old sail and spar. With heartfelt pleasure I add, that the officers and men throughout the vessel behaved in the most spirited and determined manner, obeying every command with promptitude and alertness. We had not a man wounded, and sustained no material damage in our hull or rigging.

I remain your most obedient servant,

ANDREW STERRETT.

Extract of a letter from Commodore Dale to the Secretary of the Navy.

"GIBRALTAR BAY, October 4, 1801.

"Having completed my water on the 21st of August, I sailed again. On the 30th I brought to a Greek ship, from Constantinople and Smyrna, bound into Tripoli, loaded with beans and merchandise, and having on board one Tripolitan officer, twenty soldiers, fourteen merchants, five women, four of them black, and one white child, all Tripolitans. I took them all on board. I thought this a favorable opportunity to try to bring about and settle an exchange of prisoners with the Bey, should his corsairs take any Americans, (I say God forbid!) I accordingly sent three of the Tripolitans on shore in a small boat, with a letter to Mr. Nissen, the Danish consul, requesting him to make known the contents of it to the Bey. The next day, Mr. Nissen came off, at the Bey's request, to know if I would make a truce. Mr. Nissen informed me that he told the Bey, before he came off, that he could not say any thing to me on that subject, until he had answered my letters on that point. The Bey told him to go off and try, and, if I would, he would then talk to me about the exchange of prisoners, and a peace. My mind was made up on that subject: knowing I had no orders to make a truce, little was said on that subject. Mr. Nissen told me that the Bey said that he would not give one American for all the soldiers, and that only eight of the merchants were his subjects. He cared very little about any of them. At length, the Bey agreed to give three Americans for twenty-one soldiers, and three for the eight merchants. Circumstanced as I was, I was under the necessity to act as I did, namely, to put them all on board the Greek ship again, and permit them to go into port. I wrote to Mr. Nissen to inform the Bey, that I agreed to the exchange of three Americans for the soldiers, but I did not consider the merchants as prisoners, nor could I fix on any thing respecting them, until I knew the determination of my Government, and that the present transaction was not to be a precedent in any future negotiation. This transaction took place on the 3d of September, the ship's company then very sickly, ninety-four men on the doctor's list, and a number more complaining: not knowing to what extent the sickness might go, and not having more than one month's provision on board, at eight P. M. I was under the necessity of coming to a determination to give up the blockade of Tripoli, and proceed for Gibraltar.

"Mr. Gavino informed me, about a month ago, that the Tripolitan admiral had laid up his two corsairs here, and took his passage, with eight of his officers, on board of an English ship bound to Malta, leaving the captain of the brig and twenty men, to take care of the two vessels, and bring the ship home, if he had an opportunity; sent the remainder of his men over to Tetuan in boats.

"I think it necessary that two frigates should remain in those seas all the winter, under the present circumstances. The Philadelphia to rendezvous at Saragossa, the southeast end of the island of Sicily. I shall give Captain Barron orders to show himself off Tripoli and Tunis, every now and then, to let those fellows know and see that we are on the watch for them. The Essex to rendezvous at Gibraltar and Algeziras, as may be most convenient, to keep a good look out, and know what is going on in this quarter."

Extract of a letter from David Humphreys, Esq. to the Secretary of State.

"MADRID, October 20, 1801.

"In a postscript to the duplicate of the same, dated the 16th instant, I informed you I had received a letter that day from consul O'Brien at Algiers, in which he mentioned that a revolt had existed for a few hours, while the Dey was at the mosque, but that it was soon quelled, and tranquillity restored.

"I am since in receipt of a second copy of that letter, which is continued to the 28th ultimo, wherein he advises me that the Dey had received letters from Tripoli, with the information of the blockade of that port by the American armament; stating that one Tripolitan corsair had been taken and released; that some vessels had been permitted to enter the port, and others refused; that the Bashaw had been in want of grain, and that he had offered to make a truce with the American commodore, but the latter had rejected the offer. The Bashaw, therefore, solicits his (the Dey's) succor, to relieve him from his embarrassments, and to clear from their detention his two armed vessels which are blockaded at Gibraltar. Consul O'Brien had already declined complying with the Dey's desire to give passports for two hundred and fifty men, being part of the crews of those two armed vessels, to return to Tripoli.

"The same consul further reports, that the regencies of both Tripoli and Tunis solicit the Dey that he will not admit the custom of blockade, as being a novel system as applied to them, alike prejudicial to all their common interests.

"This appears to me strongly to recommend the policy of persisting in the system on our part, and perhaps of augmenting our present naval force in the Mediterranean."

LONDON, 1*st July*, 1801.

Extracts of letters from David Lenox, Esq. to the Secretary of State.

"LONDON, January 15, 1801.

"I have the honor to send you enclosed abstract of my applications for the discharge of seamen, to the 1st instant; and a list of one hundred and twelve seamen who are detained on the ground of their having no documents to prove their citizenship, for the six months ending the 31st ultimo. I have no new observations to make respecting this business. It is a constant detail, extremely vexatious, and by my present abstract you will perceive that the impressments are to fully as great an extent as at any period since I entered on the duties of my appointment. At the same time, I must observe that my applications continue to receive the usual attention at the Admiralty."

LONDON, July 25, 1801.

"The unanswered cases mentioned in my last letter are also brought into view; and those cases which still remain unanswered will be noticed in my future communications. It may, however, be proper for me to remark, that I do not entertain a doubt but that all these men will be discharged, provided they are not under restrictions, claimed by the British Government; namely, that they have not entered, received His Britannic Majesty's bounty, or are not married and settled in his dominions."

Extracts from two letters written by William Savage, Esq., agent at Jamaica, to the Secretary of State.

KINGSTON, May 19, 1801.

"I am confident if the masters of vessels from America would attend at my office, immediately after they have entered at the public offices here, and bring their crews, there would be fewer instances of impressment than there are."

KINGSTON, July 6, 1801.

"A great number of American seamen have been lately liberated from the several ships of war on this station, and a proper respect is paid to my signature, as the accredited agent of the United States here. Could the American masters that are continually arriving here, think it their duty to call on me as they entered, with their crews, my signature on the back of the protections would prevent the people from impressment, as well as the expense and trouble that arise to procure men in the room of those taken from them."

NOTE.—He has stated about fifty-six cases of the impressment of American citizens, or of persons calling themselves so, since the last report to Congress on this subject.

Abstract of all the protests, or affidavits of masters of ships and vessels of the United States, transmitted to the Secretary of State, in pursuance of the fifth section of the "Act for the relief and protection of American Seamen," and received since the 9th of December, 1800, the date of the last report to Congress.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 12, 1802.

JANUARY 12, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I now communicate to you a letter from the Secretary of State enclosing an estimate of the expenses, which appear at present necessary for carrying into effect the convention between the United States of America and the French republic, which has been prepared at the request of the House of Representatives.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 11, 1802.

SIR:

I have the honor to lay before you an estimate of the sum necessary to be appropriated for carrying into effect the convention between the United States of America and the French republic of the 30th of September, 1801.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

Estimate of the expenses necessary for carrying into effect the convention between the United States of America and the French republic, of the 30th of September, 1801.

For captures made prior to the date of the treaty, on which no final condemnation had then passed, and of which the property was brought into the United States, - - - - -	$137,770
For captures made subsequent to the date of the treaty, - - - - -	70,351
For captures, where the property was not brought into the United States nor any condemnation had,	122,156
For cases of capture not at present known, and for a possible excess of the indemnities to be paid, above the estimate; say, - - - - - - - - - -	19,723
	$350,000

NOTE. The sum of two thousand dollars per annum, to cover the allowance to an agent at Paris, to perform the office of soliciting the claims for restitution under the convention, has been included in the general estimate for the service of the year 1802.

The repairs put upon the corvette Berceau, before her delivery to the French republic, are not included in the above estimate: they amounted to $32,839 54.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 168. [1st SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 25, 1802.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 25, 1802.

SIR:

In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 22d instant, I have the honor to lay before them a copy of the instructions, as issued by the Department of State, under the direction of the President of the United States, in virtue of the act of Congress entitled "An act further to protect the commerce of the United States," and passed on the 9th of July, 1798. These instructions were issued only to private armed vessels.

I have the honor to be, sir, with very great respect, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE PRIVATE ARMED VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES.

1st. In exercising the powers granted by the act of Congress, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce of the United States," passed the 9th day of July, 1798, and which is hereto annexed, the regulations therein prescribed are to be strictly attended to and observed.

2d. The powers of capturing and recapturing, granted by the said act, being pointed solely and exclusively against French armed vessels, and those vessels, goods, and effects of citizens of the United States, or of persons resident therein, which shall have been captured by the French, the rights of all other nations are to be duly respected; and they are not to be molested in their persons or property; consequently, American vessels and property captured by the commissioned vessels of such of those other nations as are at war, are not to be recaptured by the armed vessels of the United States. Nevertheless, any vessels found on the high seas may be examined in such manner as shall be necessary to ascertain whether they are or are not armed French vessels, or "vessels the property of, or employed by, any citizen of the United States, or person resident therein, or having on board any goods or effects belonging to any such citizen or resident," that have been captured by the French. But if they are of neither of these descriptions, they are to be dismissed with as little delay as possible. And in making such examination, care is to be taken that no injury be done to the vessel or to the persons or property on board her. It peculiarly becomes a nation like the American, contending for her just rights, and defending herself against insults and injuries, to respect the rights of others, and studiously to avoid, not only the outrage and the inhumanity, but even the incivility of which itself complains. It is hoped that Americans will be as distinguished for their justice and humanity as for their bravery and love of true liberty. If, on the contrary, any of the officers or crews of American armed vessels shall practise any cruelty or inhumanity, contrary to the usage of civilized nations, the offenders will be severely punished.

3d. For the purposes of the act aforesaid, you will consider the "high seas" to extend to low water mark on all the coasts of France, and her dominions, and of all places subject to her power, in any part of the world; and exercise accordingly the powers of capturing and re-capturing, granted by the act aforesaid. By the same rule, seeing a war exists between Great Britain and France, you may capture and re-capture as aforesaid, on all the coasts of the British dominions, and of all places subject to the British power: but you are to refrain from exercising the aforesaid powers of capturing and re-capturing, in waters which are under the protection of any other nations, that their peace and sovereignty may remain unviolated. If, however, any armed French vessel, regardless of the rights of these other nations, shall, within their jurisdictional limits, attack or capture any vessel, goods or effects, the property of citizens of or residents in the United States, and you are able to attack and take such armed French vessel, or to retake her prize, within the jurisdictional limits of such nations, you are to do it; provided their Governments, respectively, or the commanders or governors in chief in such places, give their permission.

4th. The master or pilot, and one or more of the principal persons of the company of every armed French vessel, captured as aforesaid, are to be sent, as soon after the capture as may be, to the judge or judges of the proper court in the United States, to be examined upon oath, touching the interest or property of the captured vessel and her lading; and at the same time are to be delivered to the judge or judges, all passes, charter-parties, bills of lading, invoices, letters, and other documents and writings found on board; the said papers to be proved by the affidavit of the commander of the capturing vessel, or some other person present at the capture, to be produced as they were received, without fraud, addition, subduction or embezzlement.

5th. The commanders of American private armed ships are, by all convenient opportunities, to send to the Secretary of the Navy written accounts of the captures they shall make, with the number and names of the captives, and intelligence of what may occur, or be discovered, concerning the designs of the French, and the destinations, motions, and operations of their fleets, cruisers, and armies.

6th. Where it can be done without injury or great inconvenience, the armed French vessels, captured as aforesaid, are to be sent to some port in the United States, to be tried according to law. But such captures may happen in places remote from the United States, or under circumstances which would render the sending of the captured vessels thither extremely inconvenient: while, from the vicinity of the ports of the British dominions, or those of any other Power in friendship with the United States, but at war with France, or from other circumstances, it would be easy to send such captured vessels into those friendly ports. In such cases, it will be lawful to send such prizes into those friendly ports where they will find an asylum; and if the laws of those countries admit of it, and it can be done to the satisfaction of the captors, there will be no objection on the part of the American Government to the libelling and trying such captured armed French vessels by the proper courts of those countries; where, also, may be delivered to the proper officers all French persons and others who shall be found acting on board of any French armed vessel which shall be captured, or on board of any vessel of the United States which shall be re-captured as aforesaid.

7th. With respect to American vessels, goods, and effects re-captured, it seems not necessary to bring them immediately into a port of the United States. If brought in, they are to be restored to the owners, on the payment of salvage. But such re-captured vessels, goods, and effects may, at the time of re-capture, be so remote from the United States, and so near a market, or the goods and effects may be of a nature so perishable, that to send such vessels, goods, and effects back to the United States may prove extremely injurious to the owners and re-captors: whereas, if permitted to proceed to their destined ports, or other places, to a market, greater advantages may result to all concerned therein: and, as either the master, mate, or supercargo of any such re-captured vessel is usually left on board, and with the aid of the prize-master and hands of the re-captors, which would be necessary to bring her home, might proceed and complete their original or other beneficial voyage; the commanders of the private armed vessels will, in such case, consider maturely the course most proper to be pursued, as well for the benefit of their fellow-citizens, whose property they shall thus recapture, as of themselves, in respect to the salvage to which they and their crews and owners will be entitled. Nothing on this subject is enjoined; the commanders of the private armed vessels are to use their sound discretion.

8th. If any vessel of the United States, public or private, shall be found in distress, by being attacked or taken by the French, the commanders, officers, and company of the private armed vessels aforesaid are to use their utmost endeavors to aid, succor, relieve, and free every such vessel in distress.

To Captain ———, Commander of the private armed —— called the ——.

AN ACT further to protect the Commerce of the United States.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels which are, or which shall be, employed in the service of the United States, to subdue, seize, and take any armed French vessel which shall be found within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or elsewhere on the high seas; and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, being French property, shall be brought within some port of the United States, and shall be duly proceeded against, and condemned as forfeited, and shall accrue and be distributed as by law is or shall be provided respecting the captures which shall be made by the public armed vessels of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant to the owners of private armed ships and vessels of the United States, who shall make application therefor, special commissions, in the form which he shall direct, and under the seal of the United States; and such private armed vessels, when duly commissioned as aforesaid, shall have the same license and authority for the subduing, seizing, and capturing any armed French vessel, and for the re-capture of the vessels, goods, and effects of the people of the United States, as the public armed vessels of the United States may by law have; and shall be, in like manner, subject to such instructions as shall be ordered by the President of the United States, for the regulation of their conduct. And the commissions, which shall be granted as aforesaid, shall be revocable at the pleasure of the President of the United States.

Sec. 3. Provided, and be it further enacted, That every person intending to set forth and employ an armed vessel, and applying for a commission, as aforesaid, shall produce, in writing, the name and a suitable description of the tonnage and force of the vessel, and the name and place of residence of each owner concerned therein, the number of the crew, and the name of the commander, and the two officers next in rank, appointed for such vessel; which writing shall be signed by the person or persons making such application, and filed with the Secretary of State, or shall be delivered to any other officer or person who shall be employed to deliver out such commissions, to be by him transmitted to the Secretary of State.

Sec. 4. And provided, and be it further enacted, That, before any commission, as aforesaid, shall be issued, the owner or owners of the ship or vessel for which the same shall be requested, and the commander thereof, for the time being, shall give bond to the United States, with at least two responsible sureties, not interested in such vessel, in the penal sum of seven thousand dollars; or, if such vessel be provided with more than one hundred and fifty men, then in the penal sum of fourteen thousand dollars, with condition that the owners, and officers, and crews, who shall be employed on board of such commissioned vessel, shall and will observe the treaties and laws of the United States, and the instructions which shall be given them for the regulation of their conduct; and will satisfy all damages and injuries which shall be done or committed contrary to the tenor thereof, by such vessel, during her commission, and to deliver up the same when revoked by the President of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all armed French vessels, together with their apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and any goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, being French property, and which shall be captured by any private armed vessel or vessels of the United States, duly commissioned as aforesaid, shall be forfeited, and shall accrue to the owners thereof, and the officers and crews by whom such captures shall be made; and, on due condemnation had, shall be distributed according to any agreement which shall be between them; or, in failure of such agreement, then by the discretion of the court before whom such condemnation shall be.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all vessels, goods, and effects, the property of any citizen of the United States, or person resident therein, which shall be re-captured, as aforesaid, shall be restored to the lawful owners, upon payment by them, respectively, of a just and reasonable salvage, to be determined by the mutual agreement of the parties concerned, or by the decree of any court of the United States, having maritime jurisdiction, according to the nature of each case: Provided, That such allowance shall not be less than one-eighth, or exceeding one-half of the full value of such re-capture, without any deduction. And such salvage shall be distributed to and among the owners, officers, and crews of the private armed vessel or vessels entitled thereto, according to any agreement which shall be between them; or, in case of no agreement, then by the decree of the court, who shall determine upon such salvage.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, before breaking bulk of any vessel which shall be captured, as aforesaid, or other disposal or conversion thereof, or of any articles which shall be found on board the same, such capture shall be brought into some port of the United States, and shall be libelled and proceeded against before the district court of the same district; and if, after a due course of proceeding, such capture shall be decreed as forfeited, in the district court, or in the circuit court of the same district, in the case of any appeal duly allowed, the same shall be delivered to the owners and captors concerned therein, or shall be publicly sold by the marshal of the same court, as shall be finally decreed and ordered by the court: And the same court, who shall have final jurisdiction of any libel or complaint of any capture, as aforesaid, shall and may decree restitution, in whole or in part, when the capture and restraint shall have been made without just cause, as aforesaid; and, if made without probable cause, or otherwise unreasonably, may order and decree damages and costs to the party injured, and for which the owners, officers, and crews of the private armed vessel or vessels by which such unjust capture shall have been made, and also such vessel or vessels shall be answerable and liable.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all French persons, and others, who shall be found acting on board any French armed vessel, which shall be captured, or on board of any vessel of the United States, which shall be re-captured as aforesaid, shall be reported to the collector of the port in which they shall first arrive, and shall be delivered to the custody of the marshal, or of some civil or military officer of the United States, or of any State, in or near such port, who shall take charge for their safe keeping and support, at the expense of the United States.

Enacted into a law, July 9, 1798.

By command of the President of the United States of America:

———— Secretary of State.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, 23*d January*, 1802.

SIR:

Agreeably to a resolution of the House of Representatives, I have the honor to enclose copies of the instructions heretofore given by this Department to the commanders of vessels in the public service, authorizing the capture of vessels belonging to the French republic.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

RT. SMITH.

Honorable SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

JOHN ADAMS, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Instructions to the commanders of armed vessels belonging to the United States, given at Philadelphia, this 28th day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and in the twenty-second year of the independence of the said States.

Whereas, it is declared by an act of Congress, passed the 28th day of May, 1798, that armed vessels, sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the French republic, have committed depredations on the commerce of the United States, and have recently captured the vessels and property of citizens thereof, on and near the coasts, in violation of the law of nations and treaties between the United States and the French nation:

Therefore, and in pursuance of the said act, you are instructed and directed to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, to be proceeded against according to the laws of nations, any armed vessel sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the French republic, which shall have committed, or which shall be found hovering on the coasts of the United States for the purpose of committing depredations on the vessels belonging to citizens thereof; and also to retake any ship or vessel of any citizen or citizens of the United States, which may have been captured by any such armed vessel.

By command:

JAMES M'HENRY, Secretary of War.

JOHN ADAMS, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Instructions to commanders of armed vessels belonging to the United States, given at Philadelphia, the tenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and in the twenty-third year of our independence.

In pursuance of the acts of Congress, passed the 28th day of May, the 20th day of June, and the 9th day of July:

You are hereby authorized, instructed, and directed to subdue, seize, and take any armed French vessel or vessels, sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the French republic, which shall be found within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or elsewhere on the high seas; and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and the goods and effects which shall be found on board of the same, to bring within some port of the United States; and also retake any vessel, goods, and effects of the United States, or persons resident therein, which may have been captured by any French vessel, in order that proceedings may be had concerning such capture or re-capture, in due form of law, and as to right shall appertain.

By command of the President of the United States of America:

BEN. STODDERT. [L. S.]

Circular instructions to the captains and commanders of vessels in the service of the United States.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, 12*th March*, 1799.

SIR:

Herewith you will receive an act of Congress "further to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof," the whole of which requires your attention. But it is the command of the President that you consider particularly the fifth section as part of your instructions, and govern yourself accordingly.

A proper discharge of the important duties arising out of this act will require the exercise of a sound and an impartial judgment. You are not only to do all that in you lies, to prevent all intercourse, whether direct or circuitous, between the ports of the United States and those of France, or her dependencies, in cases where the vessels or cargoes are apparently, as well as really, American, and protected by American papers only; but you are to be vigilant that vessels or cargoes really American, but covered by Danish or other foreign papers, and bound to or from French ports, do not escape you. Whenever, on just suspicion, you send a vessel into port, to be dealt with according to the aforementioned law, besides sending with her all her papers, send all the evidence you can obtain, to support your suspicions and effect her condemnation. At the same time that you are thus attentive to fulfil the objects of the law, you are to be extremely careful not to harass or injure the trade of foreign nations with whom we are at peace, nor the fair trade of our own citizens.

A misconstruction of his authority by Captain Nicholson, in relation to vessels of friendly nations, captured by the French, renders it necessary that I should make some explanatory observations on that subject. Our laws direct the capture of all armed vessels sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the French republic. A vessel captured by the citizens of France must be considered as sailing under the authority of France; and it is scarcely to be supposed that, in times like the present, when few vessels sail without arms, a captured vessel in possession of the captors will be so circumstanced as not to come under the description of an armed vessel within the meaning of our laws. To justify a re-capture, nothing is necessary but that the vessel be provided with such means of annoyance as will render her dangerous to an unarmed American vessel in pursuit of lawful commerce. If, however, the vessel cannot be considered an armed vessel, within the meaning of our laws, you are not to re-capture her, unless you should have probable cause to suspect that the citizens of the United States, or persons resident therein, have some interest in the vessel or cargo.

It is always your duty to recapture American property, and property of persons resident within the United States, whenever found in possession of the French on the high seas.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

BEN. STODDERT.

Circular to the Captains in the Navy of the United States.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 29th, 1800.

SIR:

I understand that there is money in your hands arising from the sales of French armed vessels captured by our vessels of war, and sold in the West Indies, because they were not in a condition to proceed to the United States for regular trial and condemnation. You will be pleased to pay over to the Treasurer of the United States such portion of the prize money as would have belonged to the United States, had the vessels been regularly condemned, and distribute the residue as the law directs in cases of regular condemnation; for doing which, this letter shall be your authority. You will transmit to the Accountant of the Navy an account of the sales of the vessels, &c. in this predicament.

I have the honor, &c.

B. STODDERT, Secretary of the Navy.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 169. 1st SESSION.

BARBARY STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 18, 1802.

FEBRUARY 16, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit a statement of the expenses incurred by the United States, in their transactions with the Barbary Powers, and a roll of the persons having office or employment under the United States, as was proposed in my messages of December the 7th and 22d. Neither is as perfect as could have been wished; and the latter not so much so as further time and inquiry may enable us to make it.

The great volume of these communications, and the delay it would produce to make out a second copy, will, I trust, be deemed a sufficient reason for sending one of them to the one House, and the other to the other, with a request that they may be interchanged for mutual information, rather than to subject both to further delay.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 16, 1802.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to me, together with the documents accompanying it, containing an account of the moneys drawn out of the treasury under the several appropriations made for defraying the expenses incident to the intercourse with the Mediterranean Powers, and statements of the credits obtained or claimed at the treasury by the persons to whom they were advanced.

It would have been very desirable to separate the whole amount expended into the several subordinate heads of expense intimated in the close of the Secretary's letter; but, apprised of your wish to communicate, as soon as possible, such information as that letter affords, I forbear to detain it, especially as an opinion of the present scantiness of materials to effect the separation referred to does not encourage the hope of its being rendered perfect.

With the highest respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MADISON.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 30, 1802.

SIR:

In compliance with your request, I have the honor to enclose an account of the moneys drawn out of the treasury, under the several appropriations made for defraying the expenses incident to the intercourse with the Mediterranean Powers; transcripts of the accounts of persons to whom the said moneys were respectively advanced, so far as the same have been settled at the treasury; and statements of the credits, not yet ultimately admitted, but claimed on account of such expenses, so far as the same can be ascertained from the accounts rendered, though not yet definitively settled, by the accounting officers of this Department.

The greater part of the accounts being yet unsettled, and several of the most important not having yet been rendered, it is not practicable to state, with precision, in what manner the whole of the sums drawn out of the treasury has been ultimately applied.

It is, however, believed, that the annexed sketch (AA) will prove sufficiently correct to show, without material error, the gross amount actually expended.

The sums drawn out of the treasury amount, including $5,683 30 reimbursed to C. Colville and others, for their ransom, to	$2,011,998 65
Mr. I. Whelen, purveyor of supplies, has expended, beyond the sum for which he is already debited in the treasury books, being principally for timber and supplies, received from the Navy Department,	47,330 46
Making an aggregate amount of	2,059,320 11

On the other hand, it appears that two items, making part of the sums drawn out of the treasury ought to be deducted from that gross amount, the same not having been applied to the object for which they had thus been drawn:

1st. The amount advanced to Mr. Francis, late purveyor of supplies, on account of Mediterranean Powers, is	288,782 12
The amount of credits claimed by him, on that account, is only	274,262 83
Leaving a surplus, not applied to that object, of	14,519 29

2dly. The account rendered by Mr. Pickering, late Secretary of State, is general, and denotes only the persons to whom the public moneys, drawn by him, were advanced, without particularizing the objects for which said moneys were advanced, which renders it impossible, until those persons shall have settled their accounts, to ascertain, with precision, the credits to which he may be entitled under each distinct object of expenditure, respectively.

Mr. Kimbel, late clerk in your Department, has, however, at the request of the comptroller, drawn the sketch of a particular account, showing the purpose for which the moneys were respectively advanced.

The amount which he states to have been advanced by Mr. Pickering to sundry persons, in relation to Algiers, and other Mediterranean Powers, is	310,466 17
To which should be added, not being included in that statement—
Amount of an account now before the comptroller,	5,342 15
And paid by Mr. Humphreys to I. Burnham, for his ransom, being part of the moneys charged to Mr. Pickering,	2,000 00
Making altogether,	317,808 32
The amount for which Mr. Pickering remains charged in the treasury books, under that head, is,	352,736 74
Leaving a difference (if Mr. Kimbel's statement shall prove correct) applied to other objects, of	34,928 42
Which sum, added to the preceding item of	14,519 29
Makes the sum drawn out of the treasury, under the appropriations for Mediterranean Powers, but not applied to that object,	49,447 71
Which sum, deducted from the above stated gross amount of	2,059,329 11
Leaves for the apparent sum actually applied to that object, as per statement (AA,)	2,009,881 40
If to this sum shall be added the expenditures on account of the voyage of the ship "George Washington" to Algiers, in 1800, which have been defrayed by the Navy Department, and are stated at	36,255 82
The total amount of real expenditures, will be	$2,046,137 22

Exclusively of sundry expenses incurred, but not yet paid, during the course of last year.

It must be repeated that, although this is probably an accurate account of the gross sums disbursed by the United States, the documents in the Treasury Department by no means show the ultimate application of the money, but only the names of the individuals who remain accountable.

The account rendered by Mr. Donaldson, of which an abstract (Z) is enclosed, is, as far as has been ascertained, the only one in the Department not alluded to in the sketch (AA,) which can throw any additional light on the subject.

The accounts, when ultimately rendered and settled, should exhibit the amount paid, in order to obtain treaties, to each of the Barbary Powers; the amount lost by the various remittances in stock or bills of exchange; the amount paid for the annuity due to Algiers; and the amount paid to those several States as presents, or extorted at different times under various pretences. It is presumable that there may be, in the Department of State, information, which, combined with the accounts now enclosed, would assist, even at present, in drawing a sketch of that kind.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

BARBARY STATES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 1, 1802.

MARCH 1, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit, for the information of Congress, letters recently received from our consuls at Gibraltar and Algiers, presenting the latest view of the state of our affairs with the Barbary Powers. The sums due to the Government of Algiers are now fully paid up; and of the gratuity which had been promised to that of Tunis, and was in a course of preparation, a small portion only remains still to be finished and delivered.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract of a letter from John Gavino, Esq. Consul of the United States of America at Gibraltar, to the Secretary of State.

"DECEMBER 29, 1801.

"On the 22d instant, arrived Captain M'Neale, in eight days from L'Orient, in the State frigate Boston, and proceeded next day into the Mediterranean in quest of Commodore Dale. By said gentleman I was honored with your letter of 3d October last, with two enclosed for consul Cathcart, which I have forwarded by different posts to consul Appleton, of Leghorn, to be delivered him, if there; else to be sent him by some safe conveyance.

"Three Swedish frigates, commanded by an admiral, arrived at Malaga from Sweden, to cruise against the Tripolines.

"I am just informed from Malaga, that the Swedish admiral Cedestron has four frigates, and his orders from the King of Sweden are to consult and co-operate with Commodore Dale regarding the Tripolines."

Extract of a letter from John Gavino, Esq., American Consul at Gibraltar, to the Secretary of State.

"JANUARY 11, 1802.

"The last despatch I had the honor of addressing you was No. 178, to which refer, as well as the copy of consul O'Brien's letter, then enclosed you.

"On the 7th instant arrived an English frigate from England, with a British consul on board, and the Algerine ambassador, who had been some time in England. The consul, Mr. Hargrave, had a box entrusted to him from our minister, Mr. King, for consul Eaton, of Tunis, which contained jewels, as a present from our President for the Bey. They sailed said day, and I informed consul O'Brien thereof, to be on the look out for their safety, as Mr. Hargrave meant to go from Algiers to Tunis by land.

"I now enclose you a copy of a letter from Commodore Dale, dated at Toulon, the 7th ultimo, duplicates of which I delivered to Captain Bainbridge, whose frigate is at anchor in Algeziras bay. Captain M'Neale, in the Boston, sailed from Malaga for Toulon, to see Commodore Dale. Consul Simpson writes me from Tangier that the Tripoline ambassador had gone up to see the emperor, and that the commander of the cruiser laid up here had been with him some time.

"P. S. The Swedish admiral has left Malaga to join Commodore Dale."

Captain O'Brien to Consul Gavino, at Gibraltar.

ESTEEMED SIR: ALGIERS, November 28, 1802.

On the 14th instant called off this port the United States' ship President, Commodore Dale. He landed the money thirty fathoms, and I have therewith made a cash payment to the regency for one year's annuity. The President steered [for] Mahon. On the 22d sailed the United States' ship George Washington, having under her convoy for Tunis the ship Peace and Plenty. There was no alternative for the detention of those two vessels at Algiers, owing to severe weather to unload and ballast; the which, and the fitting out of six sail of the largest corsairs, occupied the marine entirely for nineteen days. They sailed on the 5th instant, and since I have not heard more of them. I suppose the westerly winds have driven them to the east.

We have finally paid all our debt to the regency on the annuities. We are square for six years, from the 5th September, 1795, to the 5th September, 1801. We owe to the Bey and Bashaw of Algiers fifteen fathom and some rope yarns; and I have, besides, given bills to Captain Shaw, on the Secretary of State, for eight fathom and some strands and rope yarns. This information please to forward to the Secretary of State, and communicate the same to the captains of the United States' frigates which should be at or call at Gibraltar. I am, sir, &c.

O'BRIEN.

N. B. The Washington, from Tunis, will run down the other shore, and offer convoy to all that will be ready to accept of her protection.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 171. [1st SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MARCH 29, 1802.

MARCH 29, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The commissioners who were appointed to carry into execution the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, having differed in opinion as to the objects of that article, and discontinued their proceedings, the Executive of the United States took early measures, by instructions to our minister at the British court, to negotiate explanations of that article. This mode of resolving the difficulty, however, proved unacceptable to the British Government, which chose rather to avoid all further discussion and expense under that article, by fixing at a given sum the amount for which the United States should be held responsible under it. Mr. King was consequently authorized to meet this proposition; and a settlement in this way has been effected, by a convention entered into with the British Government, and now communicated for your advice and consent, together with the instructions and correspondence relating to it. The greater part of these papers being originals, the return of them is requested at the convenience of the Senate.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Convention between the United States and Great Britain.

Difficulties having arisen in the execution of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London, on the 4th day of November, 1794, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, and, in consequence thereof, the proceedings of the commissioners under the seventh article of the same treaty having been suspended; the parties to the said treaty being equally desirous, as far as may be, to obviate such difficulties, have respectively named plenipotentiaries to treat and agree respecting the same, that is to say: His Britannic Majesty has named for his plenipotentiary the right honorable Robert Banks Jenkinson, commonly called Lord Hawkesbury, one of His Majesty's most honorable privy council and his principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, has named for their plenipotentiary Rufus King, Esquire, minister plenipotentiary of the said United States to His Britannic Majesty; who have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ART. 1. In satisfaction and discharge of the money which the United States might have been liable to pay in pursuance of the provisions of the said sixth article, which is hereby declared to be cancelled and annulled, except so far as the same may relate to the execution of the said sixth article, the United States of America hereby engage to pay, and His Britannic Majesty consents to accept, for the use of the people described in the said sixth article, the sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, payable at the time and places, and in the manner following, that is to say: the said sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling shall be paid at the city of Washington, in three annual instalments of two hundred thousand pounds sterling each, and to such person or persons as shall be authorized by His Britannic Majesty to receive the same; the first of the said instalments to be paid at the expiration of one year, the second instalment at the expiration of two years, and the third and last instalment at the expiration of three years next following the exchange of the ratifications of this convention. And to prevent any disagreement concerning the rate of exchanges, the said payments shall be made in the money of the said United States, reckoning four dollars and forty-four cents to be equal to one pound sterling.

ART. 2. Whereas it is agreed by the fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace, concluded at Paris on the 3d day of September, 1783, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, that creditors oneither side should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of all bonâ fide debts theretofore contracted: it is hereby declared, that the said fourth article, so far as respects its future operation, is hereby recognized, confirmed, and declared to be binding and obligatory on His Britannic Majesty and the said United States, and the same shall be accordingly observed with punctuality and good faith, and so as that the said creditors shall hereafter meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of their bonâ fide debts.

ART. 3. It is furthermore agreed and concluded that the commissioners appointed, in pursuance of the seventh article of the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, and whose proceedings have been suspended, as aforesaid, shall, immediately after the signature of this convention, re-assemble and proceed in the execution of their duties, according to the provisions of the said seventh article; except only, that instead of the sums awarded by the said commissioners being made payable at the time or times by them appointed, all sums of money by them awarded to be paid to American or British claimants, according to the provisions of the said seventh article, shall be made payable in three equal instalments: the first whereof to be paid at the expiration of one year, the second at the expiration of two years, and the third and last at the expiration of three years, next after the exchange of the ratification of this convention.

ART. 4. This convention, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the respective ratifications duly exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory upon His Majesty and the said United States.

In faith whereof, we, the undersigned plenipotentiaries of His Britannic Majesty, and of the United States of America, by virtue of our respective full powers, have signed the present convention, and have caused the seals of our arms to be affixed thereto.

Done at London, the 8th day of January, 1802.

HAWKESBURY, [L. S.]
RUFUS KING. [L. S.]

CORRESPONDENCE AND NEGOTIATIONS RELATING TO THE CONVENTION.

The Secretary of State to Rufus King, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 5, 1799.

The differences of opinion among the commissioners here, under the sixth article of the British treaty, will doubtless suspend their proceedings. The claims not only surpass immensely, in amount, whatever was contemplated by us, but are advocated on principles which appear quite inadmissible. They go the length to make the United States at once the debtor for all the outstanding debts of British subjects contracted before the peace of 1783, and, in effect, reduce the Board to a company of clerks, whose chief business would be to examine and see that the accounts were rightly cast. The amount of the claims presented exceeds nineteen millions of dollars. I expect a statement will be made of the claims and arguments on one side, and the reasons with which they are combated on the other; which, with the requisite documents, will be transmitted to you. They will, in that case, be the subject of instructions from the President.

The Secretary of State to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 4, 1799.

SIR:

A letter received last evening from Mr. Fitzsimmons informed me that Mr. Macdonald and Mr. Rich, commissioners appointed by Great Britain, under the sixth article of the treaty of amity and commerce, were going to embark for England, in the packet to sail this week from New York. It appears, from Mr. Fitzsimmons's letter, to have been to him a sudden and unexpected movement. But I do not know that this step, if it could be prevented, should be objected to, because I see no probability that the business of the Board can ever be executed by the present members. Independently of the opinions strongly expressed, which it would not be easy to retract, there appears to me an incompatibility of temper: if I am rightly informed, it would be difficult for any set of American commissioners to act harmoniously with Mr. Macdonald unless they possessed such meek and yielding dispositions as to submit implicitly to his dogmas. Such meekness is in his colleagues, Mr. Rich and Mr. Guillemard; who though they appear, and I verily believe them to be, worthy men, have not in a single instance dissented from Mr. Macdonald, or started an objection to any thing he has advanced: so that it would be perfectly equal, as to the final issue of their proceedings, whether they continued members of the Board, or that Mr. Macdonald were authorized on every question to give three votes. It has even appeared, as I have been informed, that Mr. Guillemard, who, as an umpire should have kept himself aloof, and formed his opinions upon discussions before the Board, has been so little aware of what propriety and dignity imposed on him as a duty, that he has entered into the private deliberations of the two British commissioners, and come to the Board with all the decisive prepossessions which such private, partial consultations were calculated to produce. If I am rightly informed, Mr. Macdonald is not only thus predominant, but that, towards the American commissioners, he has been in the highest degree overbearing and arrogant, and not very delicate towards our country.

I think it fortunate that you are acquainted with the individual characters of the American commissioners. You know also all the members of the Executive Government, except the Secretary of the Navy; and you know the members of the two houses of Congress, of leading influence in the measures of the United States; and you know that all these, besides detesting every species of fraud and evasion, and that, above all things, they are ambitious of maintaining the character of unblemished integrity and good faith, are particularly desirous of completely executing, what they so indefatigably labored to establish, the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain. Here is a pledge on which Great Britain may rely. But the commissioners differ essentially in the construction of the treaty. The points of difference must then become the subjects of further negotiation between the two Governments. These points have been laid before the President by the Attorney General: the American commissioners will do it more fully, and the result will undoubtedly be an instruction to you to confer with the British minister, and agree on an explanatory article, which may be satisfactory to both countries. In the meantime, I send for your information a copy of the Attorney General's letter, and the copy of a more concise summary drawn up by Mr. Sitgreaves, and of a long letter which I received from the American commissioners in March last.

Secretary of State to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 4, 1799.

I was misinformed respecting the British commissioners when I last wrote you. Mr. Rich only embarked for England; but Mr. Macdonald might as well have taken his departure, for there exists "an incompatibility of temper" which will necessarily prevent any further harmony between him and the commissioners on the part of the United States. Indeed, the other two British commissioners have been so absolutely under the influence of Mr. Macdonald, and have committed themselves so far in his spirit and temper, that I conceive it impossible that the business of the Board can hereafter be conducted with them, with the requisite harmony and mutual confidence to ensure a satisfactory result. The President will be here before the expiration of this month, and, as soon as practicable, a full state of this business will be prepared and transmitted for your information. But Mr. Sitgreaves, who is a perfect master of the subject, has engaged to make such a digest of the claims, and such an ample statement of the points in controversy, as will vastly facilitate the ultimate adjustment of the principles and constructions which must govern the future proceedings of the Board. This, however, he informs me, will take up much time; so much, that it cannot probably be accomplished earlier than the usual time of the departure of the December packet.

Secretary of State to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, December 31, 1799.

SIR:

The proceedings contemplated by the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, having been interrupted, in consequence of an essential diversity of opinion between the commissioners named on the part of the United States, and the other members of the Board, the President has determined to propose that the true interpretation of that article should be settled by such a mutual and friendly explanation as will give full effect to the just engagements which were thereby formed on the part of the United States.

That you may be fully informed of the points in dispute, you will receive herewith a collection of documents comprising a variety of claims, the arguments of the agents on both sides, upon those claims, the reasonings and opinions of the members of the Board, and the decisions adopted by a majority of the commissioners. It is believed that these papers contain every thing essential to be known. The same documents will doubtless be transmitted by the British agents or commissioners to the minister of His Britannic Majesty, to whom the cognizance of the business may belong: but, if otherwise, those sent to you may be communicated to him. To these documents, exhibiting the proceedings before the Board, are added the correspondence between the commissioners named on the part of the United States, after their secession from the Board, and the other members thereof; and a letter from the Attorney General, dated the 1st of last August, to the President, presenting a general view of the subject, the nature of the claims of the British creditors, or persons assuming that character; the leading principles relative to those claims, as maintained by three of the commissioners; and the sweeping effects of those principles, were they to be carried into execution, according to the ideas entertained of them by the Attorney General.

Although an examination of these documents will satisfy you that the commissioners, named on the part of the United States, had just cause for their secession, yet it has not been found an easy matter to define, on every subject of difference, the limits of concession and demand on the part of the United States: and hence the necessity of postponing full and final instructions. It is, however, important that, with the voluminous documents now transmitted, you should receive information of the view which the President has taken of the subject at this time: and he considers the following to be Principles proper to form the basis of an article or articles explanatory of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, and for facilitating its due execution.

First. The description by which claimants are designated in said sixth article of the treaty of amity, shall be deemed to include all persons, whether resident in Europe or America, who were on the side of His Britannic Majesty at the commencement of the late war, and so continued throughout the war, and until the exhibition of claim. But no person shall be deemed to be a British creditor within the meaning of the said article, who shall, at any time before the peace, have been openly on the American side, or actually subject to the laws of the States respectively, or who shall since the peace have become a citizen of the United States, or have declared his intention to become a citizen agreeably to the provisions of the act of Congress.

Second. A claimant possessing the character before defined shall be held to prove to the satisfaction of the Board of Commissioners:

1st. That the debt was bonâ fide contracted before the peace, and due and unpaid to the creditor at the exhibition of claim. Accounts shall be stated, with the date and amount of each item; and the claimant shall in every instance make oath or affirmation that all the credits are disclosed to which the debtor is believed to be entitled.

2d. That the debtor was solvent at the peace, and for such a reasonable time afterwards, within which the debt might have been recovered by judicial process, if lawful impediments had not been interposed.

3d. That the creditor used reasonable diligence to obtain payment from his debtor; although the prosecuting of suits is not to be deemed a necessary evidence of such diligence.

4th. That some lawful impediment affecting the claimant's demand did exist to delay or prevent his recovery, or to impair or diminish his security.

5th. That, by the operation of such lawful impediments, he has sustained a loss or damage which cannot, at the time of the exhibition of claim, be repaired in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. And to this end he shall prove either that the debtor became insolvent during such operation of lawful impediment, or during such reasonable time thereafter, within which the debt might otherwise have been recovered, and is yet insolvent; or that the creditor is barred, in whole or in part, by judicial decision had against him, in the particular case, during such operation of lawful impediment, and on the principles thereof.

Third. Lawful impediments shall be deemed to include legislative acts, passed during the war, and judicially determined by the superior courts of the respective States to remain in force after the peace; legislative acts passed after the peace, and also judicial decisions of the superior courts of the respective States; by the operation whereof creditors of the description in the first section were prevented or delayed from recovering the full value, in sterling money, of debts bonâ fide contracted before the peace. But the act, consent, acquittance, or release of the creditor or his authorized agent or lawful representative, shall in all cases be held to be conclusive upon him, and no lawful impediment shall be deemed to have continued after the 24th day of September, 1789: Provided always, That the consent of the creditor shall not be implied to any judgment, rendered against him in an adversary suit: and provided also, That all claims for interest, or balances of interest, shall be left to the decision of the commissioners, except in cases adjusted between the debtor and creditor, or their lawful agents or representatives respectively.

Fourth. The various modes of execution for the satisfaction of judgments which were in use before the war, in the States, respectively; and all proceedings in the established courts, whether of law or equity, for the discovery of fraud, and the recovery of the property of debtors, real or personal, in the hands or possession of fraudulent assignees, shall be deemed and held to be, in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, within the meaning of the said sixth article of the treaty of amity.

Fifth. The United States shall be deemed bound by the said article to make compensation only for the loss or damage occasioned by lawful impediments, and actually sustained by the creditor; and, therefore, in cases where a part of the debt, whether of principal or interest, might have been or may yet be recovered, compensation may not be awarded for such part.

Sixth. And for the purpose of facilitating the due execution of the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, as herein explained, it is further agreed, that the present Board of Commissioners for carrying into effect the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c. shall be dissolved from the date of the final ratification of these presents, and, instead thereof, another board shall be constituted, to consist of five commissioners, two of whom shall be appointed by His Britannic Majesty, and two by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof; and the fifth commissioner (who shall be so named and designated) shall be appointed by His Britannic Majesty. And the said five commissioners shall, before they proceed to act, respectively take the following oath or affirmation, in the presence of each other, which oath or affirmation, being so taken and duly attested, shall be entered on the record of their proceedings, viz: "I, A, B, one of the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the explanatory articles of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will honestly, diligently, impartially, and carefully examine, and, to the best of my judgment, according to justice and equity, decide all such complaints as have been preferred to the commissioners heretofore appointed under the said sixth article of the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation; and that I will forbear to act as a commissioner in any case in which I may be personally interested.

Three of the said commissioners shall constitute a board; and shall have power to do any act, appertaining to the commission: Provided, That one of the commissioners named on each side, and the fifth commissioner, shall be present: and all decision shall be made by a majority of the voices of the commissioners then present.

The said commissioners shall first meet at Philadelphia; but they shall have power to adjourn from place to place, as they shall see cause. All claims preferred to the Board heretofore appointed, and not dismissed by the said Board, shall be considered as depending before the commissioners to be appointed in virtue hereof. But the commissioners appointed in virtue of this article shall not be bound by any acts or resolutions passed or proposed to be passed in the former Board, in any cases not dismissed by the said former Board.

The said commissioners, in examining the complaints, as aforesaid preferred, are empowered and required, according to the true intent and meaning of the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c., and of these explanatory articles, to take into their consideration all claims, whether of principal or interest, or balances of principal and interest, and to determine the same, respectively, according to the merits of the several cases, due regard being had to all the circumstances thereof, and as equity and justice shall appear to them to require; and shall have the same powers in regard to the examination of parties and witnesses, and the reception of evidence, as by the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c. were given to the commissioners heretofore appointed in pursuance thereof. And the awards of the said commissioners shall be final and conclusive in like manner, and shall in like manner be paid and satisfied, and on the like conditions, in all respects, as by the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c. has been directed and agreed.

The said commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as has been agreed between the two parties, comformably to the eighth article of the said treaty of amity, &c. And all other expenses of the said commissioners shall be in like manner borne and defrayed.

In case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of the fifth commissioner, his place shall be supplied in the manner directed by the sixth article of the said treaty of amity, &c., for the appointment of the fifth commissioner. And in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of either of the other four commissioners, the place of every such commissioner shall be respectively supplied in the same manner as such commissioner was first appointed; and the new commissioner shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties.

Seventh. The evidence in support of the claims which have been preferred, as aforesaid, shall be exhibited by the claimants, respectively, within ——— from the first meeting of the said Board; and public notification thereof, in such manner as the said commissioners shall direct: and no evidence shall be received on the part of the claimants after the said term, except in special cases, wherein the Board shall deem it just, or cause shown to prolong the said term. And the commissioners shall also have power to limit, in each case, a time within which the evidence shall in like manner be exhibited on the part of the United States: Provided, That such term shall not be less than ——— from the expiration of the time limited for the exhibition of evidence on the part of the claimant.

Of these articles, the following should be ultimately insisted upon:

The first.

The second, except the third point of proof.

The third, unless an exception should be deemed proper in the case of judgments since 1789, on the statute of limitations.

The fifth, except the words " might have been or."

And the sixth, requiring the appointment of a new set of commissioners.

I have further to inform you that Mr. Sitgreaves having, as one of the commissioners, assiduously and thoroughly investigated the subject, and thereby acquired an accurate knowledge of every question to be discussed between you and the British Government, the President has thought it expedient that he should go to London to facilitate your researches, and render you every assistance which his intimate acquaintance with the business will enable him to give. It is also apprehended that you may derive much useful information from Mr. Sitgreaves relative to transactions in the Board, which the written documents either do not contain or will not suggest; and, finally, that by this measure the conclusion of the negotiation may be expedited. For although Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Rich, and Mr. Guillemarde, in their letter of the 14th of August to Mr. Fitzsimmons and Mr. Sitgreaves, as plainly as indecorously insinuate that the two latter seceded from the Board for the purpose of delaying payments by the United States, you well know that nothing can be more unfounded than this imputation. The President is anxious to have the expected explanations speedily agreed on, that the business of the Boards in London and Philadelphia may be resumed. There is not any branch of the Government, nor, within my knowledge, an individual officer, who would not view with disdain the insinuations above mentioned. But the disposition and opinions predominating with the commissioners from Great Britain are utterly incompatible with harmony in the proceedings, and, as we conceive, with justice and equity, in the adjustment of British claims. Besides, the personalities which have taken place between the members, rendering any future cordiality between them hopeless, show the dissolution of the present Board to be indispensable. Mr. Liston has been informed that Mr. Sitgreaves is to go to London, because it was supposed that he would think it proper that Mr. Macdonald should repair thither also; and doubtless he will speedily embark.

To the documents before enumerated are added draughts of an explanatory article, and a letter referring to it, prepared by the Attorney General, which, though not prescribed by way of instruction, yet, containing ideas proper to be known by you, the President has thought it expedient to have forwarded. Definitive instructions will be committed to the care of Mr. Sitgreaves, who proposes also to take with him copies of the laws of different States, referred to as legal impediments, or the causes of them, reports of cases adjudged in American courts, and some other documents which he thinks will be useful in the course of your negotiation. Your full powers to conclude an explanatory article are enclosed, and a list of all the papers hereinbefore referred to.

It is expected that Mr. Sitgreaves may be ready to embark in two or three weeks, if a convenient passage can within that time be obtained.

With perfect respect and esteem, I am, dear sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The Secretary of State to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 7, 1800.

DEAR SIR:

My letter of the 31st of December expressed to you the ideas and conclusions of the President, on the several subjects of negotiation, relative to the execution of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the United States and Great Britain. It was then expected that a further consideration of the matter would have suggested and required additional instructions; but the President is satisfied to leave it on the basis at that time proposed. The additional documents, which Mr. Sitgreaves takes with him, will give you a more perfect knowledge of the extent and nature of the claims, the equitable adjustment of which is the object of the proposed negotiation; and, with views mutually upright, the President trusts it may soon be brought to an honorable conclusion.

But this letter cannot be closed, without expressing to you the President's sense of the injury done to the American commissioners and Government, by the suspicion, which appears to have been suggested to, if not entertained by, the British administration, that the final secession of the American commissioners from the Board was caused or influenced by any considerations of interest, either to individuals or the States, to arise by delaying awards and payments. Such a suspicion should be repelled with earnestness, and even with disdain.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

The Secretary of State to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, August 23, 1800.

SIR:

Your letters, stating your negotiations with Lord Grenville respecting the differences which have arisen in executing the sixth article of our treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with Great Britain, have been laid before, and considered by, the President.

He still retains the opinion that an amicable explanation of that article is greatly to be desired; and, therefore, receives with much regret the information, that the British cabinet is indisposed to enter on the discussion of this interesting subject.

He perceives with a concern, not entirely unmixed with other sensations, that the secession of two commissioners from the Board lately sitting in Philadelphia, has been attributed, not to its real cause, but to motives which in no instance have ever influenced the American Government.

That Government is, as it has ever been, sincerely desirous of executing, with perfect and scrupulous good faith, all its engagements with foreign nations. This desire has contributed, not inconsiderably, to the solicitude it now manifests for the explanatory articles you have been instructed to propose. The efforts of the American commissioners to proceed and decide on particular cases, instead of laying down abstract principles, believed to be untrue in themselves, ought to have rescued their Government from suspicions, so very unworthy, and so little merited by the general tenor of its conduct. The resolutions, maintained by a majority of the late Board of Commissioners, are such as the Government of the United States can never submit to. They are considered, not as constructive of an existing treaty, but as imposing new and injurious burthens, unwarranted by compact, and to which, if in the first instance plainly and intelligibly stated, this Government never could and never would have assented.

This opinion is not lightly taken up; it is a deep and solemn conviction, produced by the most mature and temperate consideration we are capable of bestowing on the subject.

This being the fixed judgment of the United States, it is impossible not seriously to apprehend, unless we could forget the past, that no attempt by arbitration to adjust the claims of individuals under the sixth article of the treaty, previous to an explanation of it by the two Governments, can be successful. A second effort at this adjustment, by the proposed modification of the Board, while the principles heretofore contended for receive the countenance of the British Government, would most probably, unless, indeed, the Board should again be dissolved, subject us to the painful alternative of paying money, which, in our best judgment, the commissioners had no power to award, or of submitting the public faith to imputations from which it could only be freed by a correct and laborious investigation of the subject. In such a situation, presenting to us only such an alternative, we are extremely unwilling to be placed.

It is, then, very seriously desired that the explanations required by this Government should be made. They are believed to be so reasonable in themselves, and to be so unquestionably in the spirit, and to the full extent of the existing treaty, that it is hoped the difficulties, on the part of the British cabinet, may yet be removed.

The President, therefore, requests that you will take any proper occasion, should one in your judgment present itself, to renew your application to Lord Grenville on this subject. Perhaps a change of temper may be produced by a change of circumstances; and there may be a state of things in which you may perceive a disposition favorable to the accomplishment of an object which ought to be desired by both nations, because it is just in itself, and because it will remove a subject of controversy, which may, in the course of events, have a very unhappy influence on that good understanding and friendly intercourse, which it is the interest of both to preserve.

The note of the 18th of April, addressed to you by Lord Grenville, stating the determination of the British cabinet, not to modify, but to reject, without discussion, the explanatory articles proposed by you on the part of the United States, assumes, as the base of its decision, a principle not only so different from those admitted by this Government, but so different from those recognized by both nations in the treaty of amity negotiated between them, and which ought, therefore, to be adhered to in all explanations of that treaty, as to warrant a hope that the determination announced in that note may not be unalterable.

His lordship assumes as a fact that "the fourth article of the treaty of peace not having been duly executed on the part of the United States, the British Government withheld the delivery of the forts on the frontier of Canada, in order that these might serve as a pledge for the interests and rights secured to the British creditors under that article."

But this is a fact which the American Government has ever controverted, and which has never yet been established.

Without entering into the always unavailing and now improper discussion of the question, which nation committed the first fault, it ought never to be forgotten that the treaty in which the claim of the British creditors, on the United States originated, was avowedly entered into for the purpose of terminating the differences between the two nations "in such a manner as, without reference to the merits of their respective complaints and pretensions, may be the best calculated to produce mutual satisfaction and good understanding."

In questions growing out of such a treaty, neither nation can be permitted to refer to and decide the merits of those respective complaints and pretensions, by asserting that the other, and not itself, has committed the first fault.

Lord Grenville, then, proceeds on the idea that the commissioners appointed by the American Government have withdrawn from the Board, merely because awards were rendered against their opinion, and on claims which they believed to be unjust.

But this idea is neither warranted by the conduct or declarations of the American Commissioners, nor of the Government which appointed them. It has been, and still is, expressly disavowed. The commissioners and their Government acquiesced under opinions which they conscientiously believed to be formed on erroneous principles, but on principles submitted by the treaty to their decision. Awards conforming to such opinions, unless by mutual consent the subject shall assume some other form, will be paid by the United States. It was not until a majority of the Board had proceeded to establish a system of rules for the Government of their future decisions, which, in the opinion of this Government, clearly comprehended a vast mass of cases never submitted to their consideration, that it was deemed necessary to terminate proceedings believed to be totally unauthorized, and which were conducted in terms and in a spirit only calculated to destroy all harmony between the two nations.

We understand the treaty differently from what Lord Grenville would seem to understand it, when he says the decision of the Board, constituted according to the provisions of that instrument, "was expressly declared to be in all cases final and conclusive."

These terms have never been understood by us as authorizing the arbiters to go out of the special cases described in the instrument creating and limiting their powers. The words "all cases" can only mean those cases which the two nations have submitted to reference. These are described in the preceding part of the article, and this description is relied on, by the United States, as constituting a boundary, within which alone the powers of the commissioners can be exercised. This boundary has, in our judgment, been so totally prostrated, that scarcely a trace of it remains. The reasoning on which we have formed this judgment it would be unnecessary to detail to you, because you are in perfect possession of it.

Believing the British cabinet disposed to act justly and honorably in a case in which we conceive their reputation, as well as ours, to be concerned, we have been confident in the opinion, that to obtain their serious attention to the subjects of difference between the two nations, was to secure the establishment of that reasonable and liberal construction of the article for which America has contended. We shall abandon this opinion with reluctance and regret.

Although the President decidedly prefers the amicable explanations which have been suggested to any other mode of adjusting the differences which have arisen in executing the sixth article of our treaty with Great Britain, yet it is by no means the only mode to which he is willing to resort. He does not even require that you shall press this proposition in a manner which, in your judgment, may lessen the probability of settling existing differences, or further than may comport with the interests of the United States. Your situation, your full and near view of all the circumstances which can influence the negotiation, enable you to decide more certainly than can be done on this side the Atlantic, on the precise course which it may be most advantageous to pursue. To your discretion, therefore, the President entirely submits this part of the subject.

If the explanatory articles so much desired by the United States be unattainable, the substitution of a gross sum, in full compensation of all claims, made or to be made on this Government, under the sixth article of our treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with His Britannic Majesty, is deemed the most eligible remaining mode of accommodating those differences which have impeded the execution of that article.

It is apparent that much difficulty will arise in agreeing on the sum which shall be received as compensation. The ideas of the two Governments, on this subject, appear so different, that, without reciprocal sacrifices of opinion, it is probable they will be as far from agreeing on the sum which ought to be received, as on the merits of the claims for which it will be paid. This difficulty is, perhaps, increased by the extravagant claims which the British creditors have been induced to file. Among them are cases believed to be so notoriously unfounded, that no commissioners, retaining the slightest degree of self-respect, can establish them. There are many others where the debtors are as competent to pay as any inhabitants of the United States; and there are others where the debt has been fairly and voluntarily compromised by agreement between creditor and debtor. There are even cases where the money has been paid in specie, and receipts in full given. I do not mention these distinct classes as comprehending all the cases of claims filed, which can never be allowed; but as examples of the materials which compose that enormous mass of imagined debt, which may, by its unexamined bulk, obstruct a just and equitable settlement of the well-founded claims which really exist.

The creditors are now proceeding, and, had they not been seduced into the opinion that the trouble and expense inseparable from the pursuit of old debts, might be avoided by one general resort to the United States, it is believed they would have been still more rapidly proceeding in the collection of the very claims, so far as they are just, which have been filed with the commissioners. They meet with no obstructions, either of law or fact, which are not common to every description of creditors, in every country, unless the difficulty, with respect to interest during the war, may be so denominated. Our judges are even liberal in their construction of the fourth article of the treaty of peace, and are believed, in questions growing out of that treaty, to have manifested no sort of partiality for the debtors. Indeed, it is believed that, with the exception of the contested article of war, interest, and, possibly, of claims barred by the act of limitations during the war, the United States are justly chargeable with the debts of only such of their citizens as have become insolvent subsequent to the peace, and previous to the establishment of the federal courts. This opinion is founded on a conviction that our judges give to the fourth article of the treaty of peace a construction as extensive as ought to be given to it by commissioners appointed under the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation.

Those, who have attended most to this subject, are of opinion that the sum which might properly be awarded against the United States would fall far short of any estimate which has probably been made of it in England, or by the British creditors or agents in this country. We are, however, sensible that commissioners, acting within their powers, may extend the sum further than justice or a fair construction of the article would extend it; and we have been taught to apprehend a construction, of which, at the ratification of the treaty, no fear was entertained. From this persuasion, and from a solicitude to perform what even rigid and unfavorable judges may suppose to be enjoined by good faith, the interests of the United States may require, and the President is, therefore, willing, that the agreement should not be strictly limited by the sum for which, in our opinion, we ought to be liable. He will be satisfied with four millions of dollars. He will not consent to exceed one million sterling.

If a gross sum, in satisfaction of all other claims, be accepted, you will of course stipulate for the lowest possible sum, and for the most favorable instalments which may be attainable.

Should it be found impossible to negotiate reasonable explanatory articles, or to agree on a sum to be received as compensation for the claims of the creditors, much doubt is entertained concerning the proposition for new modelling the Board, as proposed by the British minister. While the Government itself professes to approve the conduct of its late commissioners, much fear is entertained that their successors may bring with them those extravagant and totally inadmissible opinions which have dissolved the past, and will most probably dissolve any future Board. Before the United States proceed to take a new step in a case where experience has done so much to teach them caution, some assurances of the temper in which the commissioners to be appointed will meet ought to be received. And yet we are not satisfied that good faith does not require that, notwithstanding the past, we should consent to make a second effort for the execution of the sixth article of the treaty, in the forms it has prescribed.

On this part of the subject, however, the President has come to no determination; so soon as his decision shall have been made, it shall be communicated to you.

With very much respect, &c.

J. MARSHALL.

No. 87.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, March 25, 1803.

SIR:

It is now nearly a fortnight since Lord Hawkesbury informed me that he had lately ascertained that the American commissioners, under the seventh article of the treaty of amity and commerce, with the concurrence of the fifth commissioner, conceived themselves authorized to allow interest upon the claims before them for the time during which the proceedings of the Board had been suspended. That, as this suspension had taken place, in consequence of the suspension of the commission in America, it did not appear to him that the Board here had authority to allow interest for this portion of time. That he made me this communication in hopes that we might agree in the just interpretation of the powers of the commissioners, as it would be disagreeable, particularly at the juncture of affairs when he was speaking, again to arrest the proceedings of the commissioners. I replied that the subject was both unexpected and new, that it should receive my immediate consideration, and that I would take the earliest opportunity in my power of conversing with him respecting it.

After maturely reflecting upon the objection which originated with and was entertained by Doctor Swabey before the conclusion of the convention, in virtue of which the Board has resumed its proceedings, I informed Lord Hawkesbury that I was ready to meet him; but, owing to the discussions going on with France, he has not yet appointed a day to receive me. In the meantime, the commission proceeds in examining and deciding the cases before it, leaving open the ascertainment of the amount of the respective claims. As the first instalment of the six hundred thousand pounds sterling, to be received by Great Britain, is payable in July, and as, from the nature of the negotiations with France, I may not be able to meet Lord Hawkesbury soon, it has appeared to me proper to apprise you of this objection to the powers of the commissioners, which may be followed up by a suspension of their proceedings.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, April 23, 1803.

SIR:

In my No. 87, I mentioned the difficulty which had arisen respecting the proceedings of the commissioners under the seventh article of the treaty of 1794. Several conferences have since taken place between me and Lord Hawkesbury, but the impediment is not yet removed. At my first meeting with Lord Hawkesbury, after the communication he had made to me on this subject, I stated to him the arguments that, in my opinion, ought to remove the objection which had been raised; and I was in hopes that, on a further conversation between his lordship and Dr. Swabey, the objection would have been given up.

Some days afterwards, the under secretary, Mr. Hammond, on the part of his lordship, proposed to me, as a compromise, that three per cent. instead of six per cent. interest should be allowed upon the whole of the claims during the suspension of the commission. In my last conference, I informed Lord Hawkesbury that I could not consent to the proposed compromise, seeing no just principle upon which I could do so. He desired me, however, to confer with the Lord Chancellor upon the subject; which I shall do to-morrow, or the day after. If the objection be persisted in, the British commissioners will be instructed not to sign the awards unless the interest, in whole or in part, during the suspension of the commission, be omitted. In this case, our commissioners will enter their protest against this instruction; and, from a conversation I have had with the fifth commissioner, I perceive it to be his opinion that the awards should then be made, although lessened in their amount, by a total or partial deduction of the interest during the suspension of the commission. This course, in his opinion, will avoid the delay and uncertainty of a negotiation between the two Governments respecting the instruction that may be given to the British commissioners, and, moreover, secure to the claimants their compensation, except so much thereof as may be withheld by the instruction of the British Government, which may become the subject of future demand and negotiation.

As I understand the objection, on the side of the British commissioners, it is founded on the allegation that the treaty of 1794 did not foresee the suspension of the commission that has taken place; that the convention has not provided for it, and, therefore it is to be regarded as casus omissus. Our answer is, the treaty of 1794 sufficiently described the cases, or, in other words, creates the competenceor jurisdiction of the Board; and, moreover, lays down the riule by which they are to ascertain the full and complete compensation to be given to the claimants. The convent on, subsequent to the suspension of the commissioners, re-assembles them, and authorizes them to proceed in all respects (except one, which is irrelative to the point in discussion,) as is provided by the treaty: it therefore authorizes them, posterior to and including the time of their suspension, to examine and decide, and to grant full and complete compensation in all cases submitted to their decision by the treaty of 1794.

This reply has appeared to me so solid, that I haveben willing to believe the cabinet would feel its force: and, therefore, although a moderate interest is better than none, I have thought it my duty to reject the overture for a compromise, in confidence that the British commissioners would either be instructed to waive the objection, and consent to the entire interest; or, at worst, that they would be authorized to proceed on condition that a moiety only of the interest should be allowed.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

RUFUS KING.

"SIR:

"The objection of the British commissioners, under the seventh article of our treaty of 1794, has been given up: and the Board having to-day completed a number of awards, including interest, during its late suspension, there is reason to believe that no further difficulty is likely to occur in the satisfactory conclusion of the business of this commission.

J. Marshall, Secretary of State, to Samuel Sitgreaves, Esquire, London, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 2, 1800.

DEAR SIR:

I have had the pleasure of receiving your letters to the 29th of September, and among them that of the 23d, enclosing a copy of your letter of the 22d of April, the original of which had unfortunately miscarried.

It is probable that, before this can reach you, the negotiation respecting the sixth article of our treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with Great Britain will have terminated, and that Mr. King will have come to some agreement with Lord Grenville, or will be able to state precisely the ultimata of the British cabinet on this subject. Should it, contrary to our expectation, remain open, the President is of opinion that informal explanations may be received in lieu of the articles required, provided sufficient assurances accompany them that the commissioners, on the part of His Britannic Majesty will, in the true spirit of conciliation, conform to those explanations.

The idea suggested to Lord Grenville by Mr. King, of sending over confidential characters to the United States, with power to make arrangements for facilitating the just and impartial execution of the treaty, and with an eventual appointment as commissioners, is a valuable one. If no positive agreement can be made which will enable us to enter again on the execution of the sixth article without submitting to injurious and disgraceful imposition, this idea may perhaps be so improved as to become the foundation of a reasonable accommodation. It is certainly recommended by the probabilities you have suggested.

If the system of informal explanation should be adopted, and a new Board be constituted, in the mode intimated by Lord Grenville, there will undoubtedly be considerable difficulty in agreeing on rules which shall guide its proceedings, and in obtaining security that these rules will not be departed from. The explanatory articles which before your departure were digested by this Government, and committed to you, are believed to be a liberal as well as just construction, and would be, therefore, with reluctance receded from: indeed, there are among them some from which we never ought to recede. Such, for example, as that, to charge the United States, the British creditor must bring his case completely within the treaty, and not require that the United States should furnish evidence to discharge themselves from every claim which may be at present, or, on the signature of the treaty of amity, may have been unpaid. Such a construction appears to us so totally unreasonable, that we should never have deemed it necessary to guard against it, had not the principle been already asserted, and it is of course a construction to which we never can and never ought to submit. Other principles were insisted on which seem to us not less objectionable. But if it shall be found that a new Board is to be resorted to, it will become necessary to revise the instructions which have been given, and to modify them so far as a proper respect for justice and our own character will permit.

The President allows your return to the United States as soon as the negotiation shall have taken a turn which in your opinion may render your longer continuance in England unnecessary, or so soon as you shall have communicated fully to Mr. King all the ideas on the interesting subject of your mission, which your intimate acquaintance with it has enabled you to acquire.

With very much respect and esteem, I am, sir, &c.

J. MARSHALL.

SAMUEL SITGREAVES, Esq. London.

J. Marshall, Secretary of State, to Rufus King, Esquire, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 4, 1800.

DEAR SIR:

Your letters to No. 85, inclusive, have been received.

In my No. 2, I stated to you the opinion of the President that an adjustment, by explanatory articles of the differences which arose on executing the treaty with Great Britain, was preferred to the stipulation of a sum in gross, to be paid in lieu of the compensation to creditors demandable from the United States.

This opinion is still retained. But it has been suggested that, however unreasonable the principles asserted by the British commissioners may be, it will be difficult, perhaps impossible, to induce the British cabinet formally to abandon them. That the same thing may probably be obtained in an informal way, which would be withheld if required in the shape of a solemn public stipulation.

Under the impression that this may be the fact, the President directs me to inform you that an informal agreement, provided it be perfectly understood, will be satisfactory to this Government.

If, however, on any such agreement, a new Board should be constituted, it is of the last importance that the persons appointed to act as commissioners should possess dispositions inclined to conciliation, and characters which impress you with a favorable opinion of the impartiality to be expected in their decisions. These are requisites, the materiality of which we have been taught by experience, and on them must greatly depend our assent to another Board.

If you have brought the negotiation to a conclusion respecting the sum in gross mentioned in a former letter, or if it is in such a train that no change can, without embarrassment, be made, it is not intended to derange or unsettle the business. But if no agreement has been concluded, or has progressed so far as to pledge the United States, it is decidedly the judgment of the President that it will be most advisable to execute the treaty in the manner originally agreed on, provided satisfactory informal assurances can be obtained, that we shall not be subjected, by a majority of the Board, to an enormous burthen not imposed by the original contract.

If persons could be deputed to make arrangements here, for facilitating the execution of the treaty, with an eventual appointment as commissioners, some difficulties might perhaps be surmounted which, at present, appear very considerable, and the business might be greatly expedited.

As we cannot know the precise state of the negotiation, it is impossible to do more than to communicate, in general terms, the course which the President most wishes it to take. Having done this, to your judgment it must be submitted.

The most desirable plan of accommodation is by public explanatory articles, placing the treaty on its true principles, in terms not easily to be misunderstood.

Second to this is the system of informal explanation, by which we may be enabled, without great injustice, to execute the treaty in the mode originally designed. If, in neither the one way nor the other, a new Board can be so constituted as to comply with the engagements we have made according to their real import, without exposing the United States to the immense losses threatened by that which has been dissolved, then the stipulation for a sum in gross will be deemed more eligible than to permit things to remain in their present unsettled situation.

We are surprised that, at the date of your No. 85, no letter on this subject had been received from this Department.

With the most respectful esteem, &c.

RUFUS KING, Esq. J. MARSHALL.

Extracts of a letter from Levi Lincoln, Acting Secretary of State, to Rufus King, Esq., dated

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, April 25, 1801.

"DEAR SIR:

"From various sources you will have learned, probably, before this reaches you, the situation of the new administration, and the circumstances generally on which the new Government commenced. It is not yet fully organized. Mr. Madison, whose duties I am appointed to perform, will enter the office the beginning of the next month. * * * * The administration will then have its attention particularly called to its foreign concerns."

"It is proper, however, that I should acknowledge the reception of yours, from No. 91 in your second, to No. 5 in your third series, (with the exception of No. 95 only) which have reached the office since I have been acting in it. Having no special instructions from the President on subjects as the objects for the particular attention of foreign ministers, I can only state to you his great solicitude of convincing all nations with which this country is connected, and especially the united nation of Great Britain and Ireland, of the continued friendly disposition of the United States towards it. That he will, on all occasions, and by every means in his power, endeavor to cultivate harmony and a good understanding; that, adhering strictly to the principles and laws of neutrality, he will, on a just and liberal policy, encourage that correspondence and commercial intercourse which is so essential to the interest and prosperity of both countries.

"The United States are deeply interested in your securing the objects about which you have been treating with Lord Grenville; and especially of closing the business of the sixth article, if it can be effected on the principles and for the sum you have mentioned.

"I have the honor to be, &c.

"LEVI LINCOLN."

RUFUS KING, Esq.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Rufus King, Esq., dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 15th, 1801.

SIR:

Your communications by Mr. Sitgreaves, on the subject of the proposed conversion of the claims against the United States, under the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, into a definite sum, have been duly received and taken into consideration by the President. Although there may be good ground to contest the real justice of the amount of debt which will be assumed by such a stipulation, yet, considering all the actual circumstances which are now to be taken into view, allowing particularly due weight to the advantage of substituting an amicable and final adjustment of the controversy, in place of the apparent improbability of obtaining any proper amendment of the sixth article, and of all the demands, embarrassments, and uncertainties, incident to its present form, before a tribunal composed as is the Board of Commissioners under it, the President has determined on the expediency of your pursuing into effect the negotiation in which you are engaged. It is his express instruction, however, that no encouragement be given to pretensions on the British side, by carrying into the negotiation a sum higher than that of six hundred thousand pounds, as mentioned in your No. 6, of the 7th of March last, and that no sum beyond that be finally admitted into the commutation.

It is taken for granted, that, in case the claims against the United States be liquidated into a net sum, there will be no difficulty in so arranging it as to be applicable to the payment of the indemnification awarded from time to time under the seventh article of the treaty in favor of our citizens, whose claims, according to an estimate of Mr. Samuel Cabot, of May 9th, 1798, amount to £ 1,250,000. Such an arrangement must be the less objectionable, as a discharge of the debt by instalments would no doubt be the alternative mode, and it will have the advantage of putting aside all possible inducement to delay the award of indemnifications, with a view to avoid the immediate advances of money necessary to satisfy them.

The President considers it as a matter of course, also, that an adjustment of the controversies under the sixth article will be followed by an instant renewal of the proceedings under the seventh article, and by every reasonable exertion for hastening them to a just conclusion.

A number of your letters hitherto received remain to be acknowledged. But the subject of the despatches by Mr. Sitgreaves has appeared to claim an answer distinct, and without delay. I cannot but briefly add, however, that we have the mortification to find that, notwithstanding all the forbearances and endeavors of the United States for the establishment of just and friendly relations with Great Britain, accounts continue to arrive from different quarters of accumulating trespasses on our commerce and neutral rights. This is particularly the case, not only with respect to the Bahama islands, but to Jamaica. Mr. Savage, under date of 11th April last, states that, "since the 15th January, thirty vessels, which appear to be American property, have been detained, and brought into this port, and, from the best information I have been able to obtain from the several masters, their value has been computed by me at the enormous sum of seven hundred and sixteen thousand dollars. Some few have been acquitted, after being decreed to pay both relators' and defendants' costs, which, upon the smallest calculation, is never less than fifteen hundred dollars, and, in some instances, three times the sum."

It will be an agreeable circumstance if the result of your correspondence with the British ministry shall be found to mitigate these outrages; it being the sincere desire of the United States and of their Government to see every obstacle removed to that entire confidence, harmony, and good will between the two countries, which can be firmly established on no other foundations than those of reciprocal justice and respect.

With very great respect, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

RUFUS KING, Esq.

Extract of a letter from James Madison, Secretary of State, to Rufus King, Esq. dated

" DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, July 24th, 1801.

"Having already communicated to you the decision of the President with regard to the proposed commutation of the clims againstthe United States, under the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, into a net sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, I have nothing now to add on that subject beyond my wishes that the negotiation may be brought to a speedy as well as a final issue. Your letter of May 30th, (the last one received,) countenances such an expectation more than the preceding appearances. There is, notwithstanding, much room to remark that, with due allowances for other pressures on the attention of the British Government, a due share of it has not been given to a subject which they profess to consider of so much importance to that good understanding between the two countries, which they also profess to have so sincerely at heart."

DESPATCHES, &c. OF MR. KING TO THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

"SIR: " LONDON, May 25, 1799.

" With the exception of your No. 43, I have received your letters to No. 47, inclusive. Although you are silent upon the subject, I am sorry to learn that embarrassments of so serious a character have occurred in the commission under the sixth article of the English treaty. Lord Grenville sent me, a few days since, a printed copy of the proceedings in the case of Bishop Inglis, which he received from Mr. Liston by the last packet; and, at the same time, inquired of me whether I could give him any further information upon the subject. In a conference that we have since had, his lordship intimated to me, that they should find it difficult to allow their commissioners under the seventh article, to assist in any further awards, so long as the business of the American commission remained suspended. We went a little way into the proceedings in Bishop Inglis's case; and I endeavored to show his lordship, which, indeed, is satisfactorily done by Messrs. Fitzsimmons and Sitgreaves, that the ground taken by their commissioners could not be defended. As Mr. Liston's despatch, which was intended to have been sent with the printed proceedings, was not sent, and as I had received no information from you upon the subject, it was thought best to postpone a further discussion of the business, with an understanding that the commission here, which happens to be adjourned for a few weeks, should continue adjourned until we receive more precise information from Philadelphia: but whether we are right, or otherwise, it appears to me extremely probable that the commission here will be suspended until that at Philadelphia is again put in motion. Lord Grenville observed, and I think with justice, that we have found, by the discussions relative to the powers of the commissioners under the seventh article, that constructions, in either extreme, might be given up; and I think he felt the full effect of my observation, that, whatever may be the importance of the claims before the commissioners at Philadelphia, it was very subordinate to the harmony and good understanding that happily subsists between the two countries."

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, June 14, 1799.

I last evening received a note from Lord Grenville, requesting to see me this morning. I waited upon his lordship, in Cleveland row, who said that he had read with care the proceedings of the commissioners, under the sixth article of our treaty, in the case of Bishop Inglis, and that he was sorry that the difficulties that had arisen at Philadelphia had not been removed in some such way as we had found successful here; that he thought construction had been pushed too far, and doubtful points more pertinaciously insisted on by both sides at Philadelphia than was consistent with the real object of the commission, the attainment of justice to the British creditors, and, in a manner, as far as practicable, compatible with the ordinary course of our judiciary. He was moreover ready to confess that, on one side, there did not appear to him sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion that Bishop Inglis could not have recovered his debt in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and, on the other side, it must be evident, if the construction of our commissioners was insisted upon, that it would, in a great measure, perhaps wholly, defeat the end of the article. Under these circumstances, he said he had concluded to write Mr. Liston, by the next packet, to open a new negotiation with our Government, withthe view of making some such agreement, respecting the provisions of the sixth article, as had taken place between him and me relative to those of the seventh. A time might be agreed on, as was the case here, within which our courts should decide the cases brought before them. This must be a convenient time, having regard to the nature of the business; and, being mutually understood, would require no formality. A number of cases in each class might in this way be decided by our courts. He presumed that we should not insist that each case should go through the courts. Assignments might then be made, and the money paid, as had been agreed to be done here.

They had given up the posts, and hitherto done whatever depended on them to carry into full effect the stipulations of the seventh article. This they had done from a confidence that, on our side, correspondent exertions would be made to give full effect to the provisions of the sixth article. Though Mr. Liston had given them but little information respecting the commission at Philadelphia, what he had given was important. In his last despatch, which informed them of the secession of our commissioners, he expressed his opinion that the commissioners would not agree in any awards, and that nothing would be recovered under the commission. In this situation of that commission, they could not consent that the commission here should proceed. He had no idea of breaking it up; but it must be suspended until that at Philadelphia was again put in motion.

From the tenor of this communication, as well as from some expressions made use of by Lord Grenville, I plainly saw that the measure had been considered and settled in the cabinet, and, consequently, that it was very little likely that any observations of mine would effect a change in what had been so agreed on; still, I judged it suitable to observe, that I received with much concern the communication that his lordship had just made; that true it was that the proceedings in the case of Inglis bore strong marks of a temper ill suited to the occasion; but that we could not consent to take any portion of blame on this account, as, most clearly, the construction asserted by their commissioners, and from which we only exhibited the reasons of our dissent, was extravagant, and not to be acquiesced in or defended: we had promised compensation for loss and damage of British creditors, where the same could not be recovered in our courts: there was no evidence, in Bishop Inglis's case, that compensation could not there be recovered; and, consequently, no case was made out for the interference of the commissioners. So important did the questions appear to me, and especially in respect to our national faith, that I did not see how we could acquiesce in the reproach that would be fixed upon our character by consenting to the inferences attempted to be established by their commissioners, and that I had entertained the hope that the conduct of their commissioners would have appeared to them in such a light as to have produced an instruction calculated to have removed the embarrassment that had arrested the progress of the commission.

That if, from considerations of expediency, it should be thought advisable to suspend, for the present, awards upon their treasury by the commission here, I hoped there would be no objection to the commissioners proceeding in such preliminary examinations as would bring the business to a state to be soon finished after the satisfactory removal of the embarrassments which at present stop the commissioners at Philadelphia. Lord G. made some further remarks, and we entered into a fruitless conversation respecting the construction given by their and our commissioners to the provisions of the sixth article, and concluded by saying, that it would be most satisfactory that the two commissioners should proceed pari passu; and, therefore, the stopping of one should be the signal for the stopping of the other. If, during the suspension of the commission at Philadelphia, that at London should be employed in carrying on its business to its last stage, nothing would remain to be done here, when the present suspension at Philadelphia should cease, but to sign awards, which might be completed in a week, and the commission here brought to an end before any real progress had been made at Philadelphia, where new difficulties and further suspension might occur. With perfect respect and esteem, I have, &c.

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, October 11, 1799.

In a late conference with Lord Grenville, he asked me if I had received any account of the interruption of the commission at Philadelphia; and, upon my answer in the negative, he said that he had, by the last packet, received information that the American commissioners had withdrawn from the Board; that such withdrawing might be considered as a resignation; and that he proposed instructing Mr. Liston to apply to our Government to appoint other persons to succeed them, according to the provisions of the treaty. I observed that, though I was not authorized to say any thing, officially, respecting the suspension of the commission, I had reason to expect, by the next packet, full information and instructions respecting it; and, without pretending to judge of the expediency of the measure proposed by his lordship, I would take the liberty of saying, that it did not appear to me likely to hasten a satisfactory termination of the misunderstanding that had taken place, and especially if, as I conjectured to be the case, the conduct of the American commissioners was not disapproved by their Government.

Lord Grenville replied, certainly, the approbation of their conduct by their Government would very much alter the case; and, after a conversation at some length which, without an intention on either side, entered into the discussion of several of the controverted points, Lord Grenville said he would defer writing to Mr. Liston upon the subject until I should receive my instructions respecting it. From the tenor of this conference, we may anticipate the difficulties to be expected in a further negotiation, and which the course of events may increase rather than lessen.

With great respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, October 11, 1799.

On the 1st of this month I received a note from Lord Grenville, requesting, in the usual form, to see me at 11 o'clock the next day at Cleveland Row. I was punctual in my attendance.

Lord Grenville began the conference by intimating his intention to instruct Mr. Liston to require of our Government to appoint other commissioners in the place of Fitzsimmons and Sitgreaves; and upon my suggestion that, though I had no such official information, it was not improbable that the conduct of the American commissioners was approved by the Government, and, therefore, that the proposed instructions would not be likely to remove the difficulties and disagreement that had arisen in the construction of the treaty; his lordship observed, with less moderation than usual: "If you are authorized, sir, to say that the secession of your commissioners was by order of your Government, certainly the subject presents itself in a quite different light." I have no doubt of the fact, my lord; but, as I have already said, I have no regular information upon the subject; and can, therefore, say nothing officially respecting it, except that I am informed that the American commissioners, in consequence of a disagreement in the interpretation of the sixth article of the treaty, have withdrawn; in like manner as the English commissioners, last year, seceded, in consequence of a disagreement in the construction of the seventh article of the same treaty; and, that, by the next packet, I expect exact information and instructions respecting this affair, which may, perhaps, become the subject of further negotiation. Ever since Mr. Jay's arrival here, we have pursued (said Lord G.) measures of conciliation towards the United States, and have cherished a disposition to overlook every unpleasant occurrence we met with; but I must say that we have not seen a like temper and disposition on the part of the United States; and it is easy to foresee that this spirit of conciliation must exhaust itself. I am told, continued his lordship, that Mr. Jay has declared that he had no notion of such a construction as has been given to the sixth article; and so I, upon oath, could declare that the seventh article has been construed in a way that I had never supposed it could be; but, notwithstanding, I advised His Majesty's Government to acquiesce in the award, and to pay the money. Mr. Jay and I endeavored to agree: we found it impracticable. I believe we honestly disagreed.

At length, however, we concluded the sixth and seventh articles, by which the subjects of our disagreement are submitted to arbitrators. A question arose whether their decision should be final, or subject to the confirmation of the respective Governments; and we thought it would be most prudent to make their decisions conclusive. How, under these circumstances, can it be expected that we shall consent to begin a new negotiation? However just, there would be no advantage in recrimination; but I have no reserve in assuring your lordship, whatever may have been the disposition of Great Britain, that one of equal sincerity has existed in the United States, to maintain the most perfect harmony and good understanding between the two countries; and I am wholly at a loss to conjecture to what facts your lordship can refer in evidence of a different temper. In respect to the interruption of the commission at Philadelphia, I must content myself with observing that, if England found sufficient reasons to justify an instruction to her commissioners to secede, she cannot think it extraordinary that the United States, from the same or similar reasons, have given the like instructions to their commission at Philadelphia. But, exclusive of this observation, what passes in respect to ordinary arbitrations between individuals, which differ nothing in principle from those between nations, teaches us that matters not submitted, or submitted with limitations, are sometimes attempted to be drawn within the arbitration, or to be decided absolutely, and without regard to the conditions; and, as in such cases, individuals are not bound by these irregular proceedings, so, in similar circumstances, nations must be free, in like manner, to refuse their acquiescence.

I think, said Lord G., I could show a distinction between what passed here, respecting the commission under the seventh article, and what has taken place at Philadelphia. It is, doubtless, true that arbitrators may exceed their powers; but I cannot conceal from you, on this occasion, that an opinion exists, and prevails very generally among the creditors, that it is the amount of the debts, and not any error in the interpretation of the articles, that is the real cause of the embarrassment.

I am convinced, my lord, that no opinion can be more erroneous or more unjust. I know the integrity of my own Government too well to suffer the smallest doubt on this point. No sum, however much it might exceed our expectations, that could be awarded upon any just interpretation of the treaty, would have the least influence upon our Government to elude its payment at the expense of the public faith. The interruption of the commission, as I learn through various and disinterested channels, has proceeded from the extravagant and injurious construction put upon the treaty by your commissioners; a construction in which we cannot acquiesce without humiliation, nor without opening a discussion respecting our revolution that was unalterably settled at the treaty of peace. I do not suggest, said Lord G., that your Government is unfriendly or unjust, but the clamor of the debtors, and the dissatisfaction produced in consequence of the law for granting protections to your seamen, (which, being without the requisite provisions for the security of our rights, the protections granted under it have not been respected,) may have had some influence upon your Government: this law has excited great irritation against England.

I must confess, my lord, that I never expected that the law alluded to would be cited as evidence of the want of a friendly disposition towards Great Britain, because I have considered it as a singular proof of an opposite temper. When and why was this law passed? Not until we had, without success, endeavored to conclude some agreement with England for the security of our seamen, nor then, but with the sole and just view of exempting our citizens from an injury and oppression practised upon the people of no other country.

Here a servant entered and announced Monsieur, late Count d'Artois. Lord G. immediately rose from his chair, and, observing that it would not be civil to keep Monsieur waiting, asked me if I could call upon him the next morning. I should readily have acquiesced had I not thought it incorrect that a conference asked by his lordship, and the only one that had existed for several months, should be terminated in this manner. I therefore replied that I was going in the evening to my house in the country, but that I would return in the morning, in case the Tuesday or Wednesday following would not be equally convenient to his lordship. He answered that Tuesday would be the same as to-morrow.

I attended in Cleveland Row, Tuesday, at eleven o'clock. It was two before I was received by Lord Grenville. During the time passed in the ante-chamber, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dundas arrived, and had conferences with his lordship, as had likewise the under secretary, Hammond. We had had that morning a Gazette extra, with the account of the Duke of York's success in Holland on the 2d; but there was a gloom on the faces of all these gentlemen that excited the suspicion that bad news had been received from some quarter that more than balanced the success in Holland. The arrival of the French papers a day or two afterwards brought us the account of the victories of Massena in Switzerland.

Upon being admitted, I began by making his lordship my compliments upon the news from Holland, and a short conversation ensued concerning the situation of that country. I waited for his lordship to recommence the conference, which he did by saying, with less stateliness and more good humour than were shown in the conference of the second, that, as the September packet was not yet arrived, we had no further accounts from Philadelphia; and, until we had, he did not see that any thing could be done concerning the commission.

I observed that, on recurring to my last advices from Philadelphia, I found that I had no official account of the interruption of the commission; and that my letters only gave me reason to expect information on that subject by the September packet. I then added that, since I had seen his lordship, I had considered with great attention the import of certain observations that he had delivered in our last conference: and the result of my reflections had been a thorough conviction, not only of the error, but of the injustice of their observations. It was to two precise points that I alluded: one, that the American Government, from weakness or want of inclination, did not manifest towards England the same friendly disposition that, since the arrival of Mr. Jay, England had shown to the United States; and the other, that it was the amount of the debts, and not any well founded objection to the principles or manner of the proceedings of the commissioners, that had occasioned their suspension. I proceeded, by saying that I could not but regret that these sentiments should be entertained by any one, and much more so by his lordship. On an impartial review of the avowed principles and conduct of the American Government, since the epoch referred to by his lordship, I was constrained to say, if they were not thought to be satisfactory evidence of a disposition to live in harmony and friendship with England, I should not only despair of seeing such evidence, but I felt myself, in candor, obliged to avow that I could not wish to see it; and that it could only surprise me that any one who possessed the means of understanding the political situation of the United States should entertain a moment's doubt on this point. I then added that I could not avoid feeling the injury of his lordship's observation concerning the interruption of the commission at Philadelphia, as it imputed to our Government a want of sincerity and integrity that was alike refuted by the great efforts it had made to conclude the treaty with England, and by the good faith that invariably, and on all occasions, had guided its decisions. The sum, at its greatest estimate, and under the most abusive interpretation of the treaty, was nothing when weighed against the character of our nation. We know the value of reputation; and were we not restrained, as every moral society ought to be, to do right from duty, we were sufficiently enlightened to do so from interest. Besides, we were not a nation surrounded by more powerful neighbors, and to protect ourselves against whom the devices of the feeble were necessary; on the contrary, though not as numerous, we were as unassailable and secure as any nation of Europe; and, knowing our real independence, we were also awake to the destinies of our country, and influenced by the just notions of national honor that so properly belonged to our situation and prospects.

What were the chief points of disagreement between the commissioners? The treaty of peace provides that creditors, on either side, shall meet with no lawful impediments in the recovery of their debts. Such recovery could be had only through the agency of the courts. Complaints were made on one side, though denied on the other, that, notwithstanding the treaty, debts could not be recovered, by reason of the existence of lawful impediments; and, without reference to the merits of these complaints, the United States engaged, in the last treaty, to compensate all loss and damage that had arisen by reason of lawful impediments, and which could not, at the conclusion of the treaty, be recovered by the agency of the courts. The engagement is conditional: and the United States are not bound for any debt that, at the conclusion of the treaty, could, through their courts, be recovered of the debtor. The course of proceeding, in the execution of this engagement, could scarcely be misunderstood. Each creditor, in preferring his case to the commissioners, is required to show that he is of the class in whose favor the fourth article of the treaty of peace was made; that, with due diligence, he had not been able, previous to the last treaty, to recover his debt, by reason of the operation of lawful impediments; and, moreover, that the same could not be recovered posterior to that treaty. Instead of this course, a majority of the commissioners had adopted certain resolves enlarging the class of persons included within the provisions of the treaty, releasing the creditors from the obligation of applying to the courts of law for the recovery of their debts, and, in effect, giving to them an absolute, in the place of a conditional, remedy against the United States: a construction of the treaty, not only incompatible with the guards and cautions that should attend the examination of the claims, but that impeaches the independence and purity of our tribunals. We, as well as others, desire to preserve the reputation of our judiciary. What was your lordship's language in a case by no means as strong, but that was attended by circumstances which bore an analogy to the present question? Our courts, said your lordship, on the occasion, cannot be presumed to be incompetent or unwilling to do justice. We cannot consent to see them set aside or discredited; and I am really at a loss, added your lordship, how any honest man upon his oath can say, when the experiment has not been made, that justice cannot be obtained in our tribunals.

I added, that I knew the integrity of the Government I served: I had been the witness of its sincere disposition and earnest efforts to live in harmony with England; I had long believed that harmony and friendship would be mutually advantageous; and that I had come to England with the desire of being, in this respect, useful to my country: but, if the sentiments that I had been controverting were really entertained by the English Government, I could not expect to see much good will or good humor between the two countries: and we should, I fear, differ so essentially upon the cause of the interruption of the commission at Philadelphia, that there would be but little prospect of a satisfactory negotiation on the subject.

Lord Grenville, whom I carefully attended to while I delivered these observations, and who, it was pretty plain, was not prepared to receive them, after making some attempts to discriminate between the commission here and that at Philadelphia, and to show, against all reason, that the courts here should be resorted to, but that such a course was not necessary at Philadelphia, added, that every letter he had seen agreed in the opinion that it was the amount of the debts, and not the construction of the treaty, that constituted the embarrassment.

I replied that the claimants would, doubtless, send over exaggerated reports and false opinions, and those of them who had the least pretensions to complain would probably complain the loudest; that, if my Government had formed its opinion of the Court of Appeal from the letters sent from this country, respecting the American claims depending for these six years before that court, it would not be much in favor of its competency or justice.

Lord Grenville said a new negotiation would be extremely difficult, as the creditors thought they had tried their cases, and obtained a decision in their favor; that, if the commissioners were changed, still the new ones would have before them the decisions of their predecessors. I answered that this was a consequence of an erróneous mode of proceeding. Lord Grenville said he certainly wished the business had been done in another manner.

The conversation being at a stand, I observed that I must say something to you by the packet that was soon to sail, but that I could write nothing decisive upon the subject of our conference. His lordship said that he should defer writing to Mr. Liston until the arrival of the next packet, in expectation that she would bring my instructions. If nothing could be agreed between me and him, he should then instruct Mr. Liston to make such representation to our Government as the occasion called for. They had given up the pledge they held for the fulfilment of the treaty of peace, and they must consider the non-performance of the last treaty, on our part, as a breach of faith.

SIR: LONDON, January 22, 1800.

A disposition has appeared to couple the delay that has occurred in the transmission of the instructions, concerning the disagreement between the commissioners at Philadelphia with the mission to France. The influence of this suspicion upon the present relation between the United States and England need not be suggested. It has been my aim to do away this impression, by ascribing the delay to the derangement, in consequence of the fever, and to other causes equally foreign from those which have been imagined; and I believe I am not mistaken in supposing that the subject will not be brought before the cabinet, as was intended, before the arrival of the next packet; though I have taken care not to state positively, or with confidence, that the instructions will be sent by the December packet. I shall deeply regret, and may be much embarrassed, in case they should not be; for, with the temper I have for some time perceived, and after the evidence of its character that I have sent you, I should not be disappointed if it manifests itself to our disadvantage on the first occasion that may be deemed convenient. I receive no answers to the notes, copies of which I have transmitted to you, nor shall I receive any until the injurious suspicions of our views are removed. I omit no means proper to be employed to keep things in a condition favorable to a candid and satisfactory explanation and adjustment: in doing so, you may be assured that I maintain with firmness the rectitude of our Government, preserving always a due respect for those to whom I address myself. My language is, that we are, and shall continue to be, just to every nation; that we desire to avoid misunderstandings with any; and, having entered into no engagements which oblige us to depart from this system, our efforts to remain at peace with all nations cannot be the occasion of dissatisfaction to any.

We have no account that our envoys have reached France, though they sailed from Lisbon on the 21st of December. It is mere conjecture, but I am inclined to believe that they will be received with marks of respect and esteem, and that they will conclude a treaty. Should this be the case, I hope we may not be precipitate in relinquishing our naval and military preparations. If France is insincere, or incapable to perform what she promises, we shall again want them: if the contrary should happen, we may not have less occasion for them.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

"SIR: "LONDON, February 3, 1800.

"The Grantham packet, which arrived after a short passage, brought me your despatch concerning the sixth article of the British treaty, and I have this day sent a note to Lord Grenville upon this subject, that will probably lead to the commencement of the negotiation. At present, therefore, I cannot give you any opinion respecting it: no exertion on my part will be wanting to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion, and I can be answerable for nothing further."

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

"LONDON, February 25, 1800,

"In a conference with Lord Grenville on the 18th instant, I delivered to him a verbal note containing such explanations as, on our part, are deemed requisite to the satisfactory execution of the sixth article of the treaty of amity: these additional articles were accompanied by such short observations as appeared to me calculated to explain and recommend them. As it was the first interview upon this subject, I was not disappointed in his reserve, who only remarked that it would be best to waive any observation upon the subject until he should have had an opportunity of giving it a full consideration. I have not since heard from him."

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

"SIR: "LONDON, April 7, 1800.

"As I may not be able to see Lord Grenville again for some days, he having gone to his country house, where he will probably remain through the Easter holidays, I think it proper to acquaint you that, in a conference I had with his lordship the day before yesterday, he distinctly informed me that it was the unanimous opinion of himself and colleagues not to enter into the formal discussion of the explanatory articles which I had proposed to him on the 18th of February, as they saw no probability that the two Governments would be able to agree in any explanations upon that subject; but that they would consent to the dissolution of the present Board, and to the appointment of a new set of commissioners, who should be governed by the stipulations already concluded, without regarding the constructive resolutions of the former commissioners; the fifth commissioner to be named by the King, and, instead of two Americans being appointed by the President, and two British subjects by the King, that the President should appoint one American, and name a British subject, to whose appointment the King's consent should be requisite; and that the King should appoint one British subject, and name an American, to whose appointment the President's consent should be requisite. This modification of the choice of the commissioners, it was suggested, might diminish the influence of national prejudice on both sides; but I conclude that it is not thought of sufficient importance to be insisted upon, if the former mode of choice should be preferred. I cannot now send you a detail of the reasons upon which his lordship placed their refusal to agree to or to discuss the explanatory articles that we had proposed. After hearing the few words in which he communicated this decision, I only replied that I would consider of what he had informed me, and take the earliest opportunity of communicating to him the result of my reflections. I accordingly called to-day at his lordship's house, but he had left town early in the morning. It was my intention to have represented to him the reasons why, upon the appointment of a new Board of Commissioners, it would be necessary that certain explanatory rules should be settled for the government of their proceedings, and to inform him that I was not authorized to agree to a new commission without such rules."

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

DEAR SIR: LONDON, April 22, 1800.

So much impatience had appeared, in respect to the delay that happened in the transmission of my instructions concerning the separation of the commission at Philadelphia, that I judged it expedient to lose no time after their arrival in beginning the negotiation. I accordingly informed Lord Grenville, the day after the receipt of your No. 71, that I was ready to proceed, and would either write him an official note, as the commencement of the negotiation, or prepare and deliver to him an informal paper containing the propositions we had to offer, and which might become the subject of free discussion in future conferences: his lordship intimated a preference of the latter course; and I accordingly delivered to him the paper, mentioned in my No. 65, a copy of which is annexed. In my No. 66, I gave you an account of what passed between Lord Grenville and me in our next conference; in addition to which, I might have added that his lordship asked if I was authorized to offer any specific sum of money, on the payment of which Great Britain should engage to satisfy the claims of the whole of the British creditors? Having no such power, my answer was of course in the negative.

On the 19th instant, I received his lordship's written answer to the proposals I had delivered to him on the 18th of February, corresponding, as you will perceive by the subjoined copy, with the verbal answer that had before been given to me. As this answer precludes all discussion of the articles we had proposed, on the plea that the whole subject had been finally settled by the treaty of amity, and that the United States are bound by the decision of the majority of the commissioners, whether the matter decided is within or above their powers, my first thought was to prepare and send to his lordship a note, exposing the error of a principle that confounds the distinction between a limited and an unlimited delegation of authority, and which should, at the same time, support, by further arguments, the justice and expediency of the explanatory articles that we had offered.

But, as the language of Lord Grenville in our conference was equally explicit and decided as that of the paper delivered in answer to our proposals, I, on reflection, changed my first opinion, from the persuasion that nothing would be gained by that course in favor of the future execution of the article; and, as the answer had placed the negotiation in a situation that had not been foreseen, that it was my duty to refer it, in its present stage, to the further consideration of the President.

The written answer of Lord Grenville having intimated a disposition to accede to certain regulations, which, it was supposed, might facilitate the execution of the treaty, I yesterday asked a conference with his lordship, for the purpose of obtaining a precise idea of the nature and extent of these regulations: this was immediately granted, and afforded an opportunity for a free conversation upon the general topic, as well as respecting the particular subject that brought us together. Many things were said on both sides that it would be useless to repeat: these, therefore, are omitted in this report.

His lordship observed, that the object of the delay that took place at London was to allow time to the Court of Appeals to decide the several prize cases before their examination by the commissioners, and that a like arrangement might be made in respect to the cases before the commissioners at Philadelphia. With regard to the questions of impediment, solvency, insolvency, and some others of equal importance, Lord Grenville said, their decision must be left to the provisions of the treaty, to the particular circumstances of each case, and to the sound discretion of the commissioners; adding that, upon a full investigation of the subject, he was convinced that no new and general rule upon these points could be made, without affecting cases and claims that ought not to be affected; and that, even with respect to an agreement to delay the cases before the commissioners at Philadelphia, in order that the claimant should have an opportunity first to obtain the decision of our courts, it would be difficult, not to say impossible, for him to form any satisfactory idea of what would be a convenient time, unless he had a more adequate knowledge of our judiciary proceedings, and a particular instead of a general acquaintance with the claims. Upon this point, as on most others, there seemed to be wanting a discretionary power, always present, and ready to act as occasions arose, and according to the nature and circumstances of the particular question; that the persons whom he had thought of, as two of the commissioners to be appointed by the King, were men of prudence and discretion, and with whom, he thought, we should be satisfied; that Mr. Liston, having repeatedly asked, and lately received, leave of absence on account of his health, might not be at Philadelphia; and he saw no preferable course, in case we acceded to the suggestion, to that of sending these two persons to Philadelphia, to concert with us such analogous regulations, in respect to the commission there, as were agreed to with regard to the commission here. We should, by this means, have an opportunity of knowing the character and dispositions of the persons sent to prepare and agree to these regulations, and who would afterwards be appointed to assist in the execution of the treaty.

Lord Grenville asked me in what time I supposed the courts would be able to go through the whole of the cases? I answered that this must chiefly depend upon the diligence of the creditors, and that I could not form any satisfactory estimate of the time that might be necessary: on the one hand, it should not be so short as, with a disposition in the courts to avoid delay, would defeat the object of the regulation; and, on the other, it should not be so long, as to afford any ground, from the delay, to infer that there was a denial of justice. No precise time was settled here, and, perhaps, none should be at Philadelphia. His lordship asked if there could be no means found to accelerate the trials? I repeated the observation, that more would depend on the diligence of the creditors than upon the courts, of whose disposition to give the greatest despatch there could be no doubt; that a law requiring extraordinary sessions of the courts, or prescribing a more summary proceeding, would not only interfere with the established course of our judiciary, but give birth to other and still more difficult questions, which it would be unwise to agitate.

His lordship asked whether the cases before the Board are, any of them, in a state for the new commissioners to take up, suggesting that it would be desirable that the new Board should, at their commencement, have something to do? I replied that, though I could not then answer the question with any degree of accuracy, I was inclined to believe that many cases were in a situation that, without recourse to the courts, might soon be prepared for the commissioners to decide, and that the progress of the trials would be constantly furnishing additional cases. Lord Grenville expressed his opinion that the new Board ought to proceed in a different manner from their predecessors, by deciding cases singly, one after another, instead of attempting to decide them by general resolves, and in classes.

I observed that it was possible that new difficulties might arise in the course of future proceedings; and, should Mr. Liston be absent, there would be no one with whom we could confer for the purpose of removing them. Lord Grenville replied, that, in this case, he must endeavor to find out a proper character to supply Mr. Liston's place.

I then asked Lord Grenville if he had formed any idea of the gross sum, on the payment of which they would engage to compensate the claims of the British creditors. His lordship replied that he had not; adding, that he thought the creditors had not been wise in swelling, as they had done, their claim to four or five millions sterling; though it might have no influence upon our Government, it would be likely to have some upon the people; that he himself did not like the idea of the payment of a gross sum, and that he had mentioned it to me in compliance with the opinion of his colleagues; but that, on the supposition that the debt due to British creditors did not exceed two millions, they might be willing to accept a gross sum of between one and two millions.

I shall, as opportunities offer, endeavor to acquire further information on this subject, as it may possibly lead to the satisfactory conclusion of a most difficult business.

If it is probable that we shall ultimately be required to pay, upon the award of the commissioners, a sum equal to, or not far short of, one for which the business could at once be settled, would it not be the part of a wise policy to engage to pay such sum by instalments, or in some other convenient manner? All further expense to individuals, as well as to the public, would, in this mode of settlement, be saved; we should, moreover, escape the embarrasment of any future disagreement among the commissioners, and consequent misunderstanding between the two countries: the trouble and vexation of numberless law-suits would be prevented; and, instead of the dissatisfaction and ill will towards the Government that they would unavoidably excite, a general release to the debtors would be a boon that could not fail to produce opposite sentiments.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to Lord Grenville.

Without discussing the disagreement, that ended in the suspension of the Board of Commissioners acting under the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the United States and Great Britain, it not being perceived that any advantage, in reference to the future and satisfactory execution of that article would be likely to arise from such discussion, it is proposed, on the part of the United States, that the plenipotentiaries of the two countries should endeavor to agree in such explanations respecting the said article, as shall secure to the creditors, on the side of Great Britain, the full benefit of the rights to which they are entitled, whether in virtue of their respective contracts, or from the provisions of the treaties between the two countries; and, at the same time mark more clearly the limits of the engagements of the United States.

From the extensive commercial dealings between Great Britain and America, debts to a considerable amount were due to British creditors at the commencement of the American war: these debts, exclusive of the irrecoverable losses, occasioned by the insolvency of debtors in the course of that war, were affected by various laws passed in several of the States, as well as by the apprehension lest the creditors might, after the peace, be obliged to receive payment in a depreciated paper money: to guard against this apprehension, as well as to remove every obstruction proceeding from the laws of any of the States, the fourth article of the treaty of peace provided, "That creditors on either side shall meet with no lawful impediments to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money, of all bonâ fide debts heretofore contracted." Complaints were afterwards made by divers British creditors, that lawful impediments had been suffered to exist within the United States, contrary to the aforesaid provision of the treaty of peace, and that, by the operation thereof, they had sustained losses and damages, which could not be repaired in the ordinary course of justice; in consequence of which complaints, it was agreed, by the sixth article of the treaty of amity, that in all such cases, where full compensation for such losses and damages could not be obtained in the ordinary course of justice, the same should be made by the United States: it being, at the same time, understood, and further agreed, that this provision should include such losses only as were occasioned by the said lawful impediments, and not losses occasioned by such insolvency of the debtors, or other causes, as would equally have operated to have produced the same if the said impediments had not existed, nor to losses and damages occasioned by the delay, negligence, or wilful omission of the claimant. From hence it appears that the aim of the treaty of peace was in this respect to do away every impediment in law to the recovery of all bonâ fide debts therein described, and to leave to the creditors the free legal remedy, to which they were respectively entitled at the time when the debts were created; and that the object of the treaty of amity, so far as it respects this subject, was not the removal of lawful impediments, for none existed at its conclusion; nor pledge the United States to pay the debts due to British creditors, but to secure to the creditors, under certain limitations, compensation from the United States, for all such losses as had been occasioned by the operation of lawful impediments since the treaty of peace, and which could not, at the conclusion of the treaty of amity, &c. be recovered from the debtors in the ordinary course of justice.

To establish a claim, then, against the United States, in virtue of the treaty of amity, it is conceived that the creditor should give satisfactory proof to the commissioners:

1st. That the debt was bonâ fide contracted before, and remained unpaid at the peace.

2d. That the debtor was solvent at the peace, and that the creditor used reasonable diligence to obtain payment.

3d. That lawful impediments prevented his recovery of payment; and that, during their operation, the debtor became insolvent, and continued to be so at the conclusion of the treaty of amity, &c.

To avoid misapprehension, it is thought advisable informally to present, in the shape of separate articles, such principles as, according to the spirit and object of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, are deemed, on the part of the United States, proper to constitute the basis of the desired explanation: these are also accompanied by a few observations, suggesting some of the reasons on which they severally depend for support.

REMARKS.

1. The description contained in the fourth article of the treaty of peace has a manifest reference to the state of war, and not to the epoch of peace. By "creditors on either side" cannot be meant those who were of both sides: if the words are made to include more than those who were uniformly on one side, will not such construction involve the absurdity of giving to the same person a right to claim in a double character, and of both sides?

ARTICLES.

1. The description by which claimants are designated in the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, shall be deemed to include all persons, whether resident in Europe or America, who were on the side of His Britannic Majesty at the commencement of the late war, and so continued throughout the war, and until the exhibition of claim. But no person shall be deemed to be a British creditor, within the meaning of the said article, who shall, at any time before the peace, have been openly on the American side, or voluntarily and actually subject to the laws of the States respectively, or who shall, since the peace, have become a citizen of the United States, or have declared his intention to become a citizen, agreeably to the provisions of the acts of Congress.

2. Sect. 1. The equity of this provision renders any observation in its support unnecessary.

Sec. 2. The creation or continuance of a lawful impediment may be considered as evidence that some of the debtors residing within its operation were solvent: but it would be not only illogical, but contrary to notorious facts, to consider it as prima facie evidence even that every such debtor was solvent. From the purport of the engagement of the United States, the creditor should therefore be held to prove, in every case, that the debtor was solvent at the conclusion of the peace, inasmuch as he cannot have sustained a loss by reason of the operation of a lawful impediment, unless the debtor was solvent at the peace, and became insolvent during the operation of such impediment.

Sect. 3. It seems due to equity, and is moreover required in the ordinary administration of justice, that the creditor, to charge the provisional guarantee of his debtor, should prove that reasonable diligence had been used to obtain payment of the debtor; the omission whereof, in legal estimation, amounts to wilful negligence: and common and daily practice on this subject shows that the creditor must prove that he endeavored to recover of his debtor before he can resort to his guarantee.

Sect. 4. Unless a lawful impediment existed, no loss can have proceeded from it, and, consequently, no claim can be sustained against the United States. The impediment must, therefore, in every case, be proved by the creditor.

Sect. 5. The creditor must also prove that he sustained a loss by the operation of a lawful impediment, for which he could not, at the conclusion of the treaty of amity, obtain compensation in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and this can only be done by proving that the debtor became insolvent during the operation of the lawful impediment, and that he remained so at the conclusion of the treaty: for if he became insolvent after the lawful impediment ceased, the loss cannot have proceeded from the impediment; and if he was solvent at the conclusion of the treaty, the debt might have been recovered in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings.

3. It does not occur that any other acts can be considered as lawful impediments. The law of nations requires that foreigners proceed to the tribunal in the last resort before they complain of a denial of justice; and no nation considers a complaint against the justice of its judiciary as regular, or entitled to examination, unless the complainant has obtained the sentence of the highest tribunal established for the decision of his case.

It is for losses arising from the operation of lawful impediments that the sixth article provides. Losses proceeding from the acts of the parties are distinct from those which have arisen from the operation of law, and cannot, therefore, be deemed to be within the provisions of the article. If lawful impediments existed in some parts of the United States, they existed in opposition to the repeated efforts of Congress to remove them, and their continuance must be ascribed to the imperfection of our first system of national Government and Union. This remark is not made with a view to infer, from this defect of our first constitution, an exemption from a full and complete compensation for all losses that may have been sustained in consequence of even an unavoidable delay in the performance of our engagements. It is the inclination of the United States, exclusive of the stipulations of the treaty of amity, to compensate all such losses, according to the spirit of those stipulations. But we perceive no obligation that requires of us to allow (on the contrary, the most weighty considerations forbid us to admit) that any delay in the execution of the treaty of peace continued a single moment after the period when, by a reform, and, so far as respects this point, a complete correction of our constitution, we put an end to and entirely removed the impediments which are alleged to have stood in the way of the full and complete execution of our previous stipulations. The judiciary of the United States was established on the 24th of September, 1789, since when, whatever may have been the case before, no lawful impediment has existed in any part of the United States to the recovery of debts due before the peace to creditors of the side of Great Britain.

4. The creditor may reasonably expect the assistance of the same laws and process that existed when his debt was contracted: he ought to be contented with the remedy on which he depended when he gave the credit, and he has no claim in this respect for any thing further.

5. If the creditor receives his whole debt, he is satisfied; and whether it is paid by the debtor or by the United

2. A claimant, possessing the character before defined, shall be held to prove to the satisfaction of the Board of Commissioners:

1st. That the debt was boná fide contracted before the peace, and due and unpaid to the creditor at the exhibition of claim. Accounts shall be stated, with the date and amount of each item, and the claimant shall, in every instance, make oath or affirmation that all the credits are disclosed to which the debtor is believed to be entitled.

2d. That the debtor was solvent at the peace, and for such a reasonable time afterwards, within which the debt might have been recovered by judicial process if lawful impediments had not been interposed.

3d. That the creditor used reasonable diligence to obtain payment from his debtor, although the prosecuting of suits is not to be deemed necessary evidence of such diligence.

4th. That some lawful impediments, affecting the claimant's demand did exist to delay or prevent his recovery, or to impair or diminish his security.

5th. That, by the operation of such lawful impediments, he has sustained a loss or damage which cannot, at the time of the exhibition of claim, be repaired in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and to this end he shall prove, either that the debtor became insolvent during such operation of lawful impediment, or during such reasonable time thereafter, within which the debt might otherwise have been recovered, and is yet insolvent; or that the creditor is barred, in whole or in part, by a judicial decision had against him, in the particular case, during such operation of lawful impediment, and on the principles thereof.

3. Lawful impediments shall be deemed to include legislative acts passed during the war, and judicially determined by the Superior Courts of the respective States to remain in force after the peace. Legislative acts, passed after the peace, and also judicial decisions of the Superior Courts of the respective States, by the operation whereof creditors of the description in the first section were prevented or delayed from recovering the full value in sterling money of debts boná fide contracted before the peace. But the act, consent, acquittance, or release of the creditor, or his authorized agent or lawful representative, shall, in all cases, be held to be conclusive upon him, and no lawful impediment shall be deemed to have continued after the 24th day of September, 1789: Provided always, That the consent of the creditor shall not be implied to any judgment rendered against him in an adversary suit: And provided also, That all claims for interest, or balances of interest, shall be left to the decision of the commissioners, except in cases adjusted between the debtor and creditor, or their lawful agents or representatives, respectively.

4. The various modes of execution for the satisfaction of judgments which were in use before the war, in the States, respectively, and all proceedings in the established courts, whether of law or equity, for the discovery of fraud, and the recovery of the property of debtors, real or personal, in the hands or possession of fraudulent assignees, shall be deemed and held to be in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings within the meaning of the said sixth article of the treaty of amity.

5. The United States shall be deemed bound by the said article to make compensation only for the loss or States, or partly by one, and partly by the other, must be indifferent to him. The courts may, in particular instances, give the principal, and, on the circumstances of the case, refuse interest; the commissioners may think both are due: in such instances, the principal should be received of the debtor, and the interest of the United States, and so in other supposable cases. This course agrees with the unanimous interpretation of and practice under the seventh article of the treaty. The simple restitution of property captured under the orders of November, 1793, is decreed by the Court of Appeals in prize cases, without interest, damages, or costs, and the amount of such simple restitution is received from the captor, the difference between which sum and the just demand of the claimant is awarded by the commissioners, and paid out of the British treasury.

6. After what has passed, no reasonable expectation can be entertained of a satisfactory execution of the sixth article of the treaty of amity by the present commissioners.

Whoever reads their correspondence, or the minutes of their proceedings, whatever may be his opinion of their respective merits, must agree in this conclusion. The appointment of other commissioners appears, therefore, to be indispensable; and that they may not succeed to the controversy, in succeeding to the duties of their predecessors, the proposed provision, with respect to the decision of the present Board of Commissioners, seems equally necessary.

damage occasioned by the lawful impediments, and actually sustained by the creditor; and, therefore, in cases where a part of the debt, whether of principal or interest, [might have been or] may yet be recovered, compensation may not be awarded for such part.

6. And, for the purpose of facilitating the due execution of the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, as herein explained, it is further agreed, that the present Board of Commissioners for carrying into effect the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c. shall be dissolved, from the date of the final ratification of these presents, and, instead thereof, another Board shall be constituted, to consist of five commissioners, two of whom shall be appointed by His Britannic Majesty, and two by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof; and the fifth commissioner (who shall be so named and designated,) shall be appointed by His Britannic Majesty. And the said five commissioners shall, before they proceed to act, respectively take the following oath or affirmation, in the presence of each other, which oath or affirmation, being so taken and duly attested, shall be entered on the record of their proceedings, viz: "I, A. B., one of the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the explanatory articles of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) that I will honestly, diligently, impartially, and carefully examine, and, to the best of my judgment, according to justice and equity, decide all such complaints as have been preferred to the commissioners heretofore appointed under the said sixth article of the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation; and that I will forbear to act as a commissioner in any case in which I may be personally interested."

Three of the said commissioners shall constitute a Board, and shall have power to do any act appertaining to the commission: Provided, That one of the commissioners named on each side, and the fifth commissioner, shall be present: and all decisions shall be made by a majority of the voices of the commissioners then present.

The said commissioners shall first meet at Philadelphia; but they shall have power to adjourn from place to place, as they shall see cause. All claims preferred to the Board heretofore appointed, and not dismissed by the said Board, shall be considered as depending before the commissioners to be appointed in virtue hereof. But the commissioners appointed in virtue of this article shall not be bound by any acts or resolutions passed, or proposed to be passed, in the former Board, in any cases not dismissed by the said former Board.

The said commissioners, in examining the complaints so as aforesaid preferred, are empowered and required, according to the true intent and meaning of the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c. and of these explanatory articles, to take into their consideration all claims, whether of principal or interest, and to determine the same respectively, according to the merits of the several cases, due regard being had to all the circumstances thereof, and as equity and justice shall appear to them to require; and shall have the same powers in regard to the examination of parties and witnesses, and the reception of evidence, as by the said sixth article of the treaty were given to the commissioners heretofore appointed in pursuance thereof: and the awards of the said commissioners shall be final and conclusive in like manner, and shall in like manner be paid and satisfied, and on the like considerations, in all respects, as, by the said sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c. has been directed and agreed.

The said commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as has been agreed between the two parties, conformably to the eighth article of the said treaty of amity, &c.; and all other expenses of the said commissioners shall be in like manner borne and defrayed.

In case of death, sickness, or necessary absence of the fifth commissioner, his place shall be supplied in the manner directed by the sixth article of the said treaty of amity, &c. for the appointment of the fifth commissioner; and in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of either of the other four commissioners, the place of every such commissioner shall be respectively supplied in the same manner as such commissioner was first appointed; and the new commissioners shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties.

7. It is proper that there should be a convenient limitation of the time within which each side should produce their proofs. The article leaves the commissioners a discretion to prolong the time in particular cases.

7. The evidence in support of the claims which have been preferred as aforesaid, shall be exhibited by the claimants, respectively, within ———, from the first meeting of the said Board, and public notification thereof, in such manner as the said commissioners shall direct: and no evidence shall be received on the part of the claimants, after the said term, except in special cases wherein the Board shall deem it just, on cause shown, to prolong the said term. And the commissioners shall also have power to limit, in each case, a time within which the evidence shall, in like manner, be exhibited, on the part of the United States: Provided, That such term shall not be less than ——— from the expiration of the time limited for the exhibition of evidence on the part of the claimant.

LONDON, February 18, 1800.

DOWNING STREET, April 19, 1800.

The fourth article of the treaty of peace not having been duly executed on the part of the United States, the British Government withheld the delivery of the forts on the frontier of Canada, in order that these might serve as a pledge for the interests and rights secured to the British creditors under that article.

Matters were in this situation when Mr. Jay arrived in England, charged with a mission of a conciliatory tendency; and authorized finally to settle these, as well as all other grounds of dissension between the two Governments.

Desirous of meeting, by a corresponding conduct, the disposition which Mr. Jay's mission announced, and satisfied with the spirit in which he executed that commission, the British Government, in the course of negotiation, consented to an article for the immediate surrender of the forts, and agreed to consider the good faith of the United States, and the express stipulations of a new treaty, as affording that security which had before been looked to from the possession of a valuable pledge.

Those new stipulations, in so far as they regarded the matter of the debts, were formed with the view of meeting and providing for the difficulty which arose from the great difference of opinion between the two Governments on some of the leading principles affecting the execution of the fourth article of the treaty of peace. For the final settlement of the claims of the British creditors under that article, as well as of other claims respecting which similar differences of opinion subsisted, and which could not, therefore, satisfactorily be adjusted by any detailed agreement between the two parties, it was stipulated that two commissioners should be appointed, with full power to examine and to decide; and their decision, upon oath, or that of any three of them, forming a Board, according to the provisions of the treaty, was expressly declared to be, in all cases, final and conclusive, both as to the justice of the claim and as to the amount to be paid to the claimant: which payment the respective Governments undertook to make in consequence of such award.

Two commissioners being named to each commission by the respective Governments, the choice of a fifth commissioner to each was decided by lot, and it happened that, in constituting the commission for losses by capture or condemnation, the lot fell on a citizen of the United States, while in that by which the claims of the British creditors were to be decided, the lot fell on a subject of His Majesty. In the course of their proceedings, the majorities of both commissions formed their decisions on principles adverse to the opinions of the Government against which the claims were preferred. The awards of the commission under the seventh article have, nevertheless, been faithfully executed by the British Government. The temporary difficulties which arose in the execution of that commission led immediately to amicable explanation between His Majesty's Government and the minister of the United States, in pursuance of which some regulations adapted to one class of cases were proposed to the commissioners with a view to conciliation. In consequence of this proposal, a variation took place in the order and time of proceeding on those cases, but no change was made in the principles adopted by the majority as the ground of their awards: and considerable sums have actually been paid to American claimants in cases where the award of the commissioners has rested on doctrines which are decidedly held to be erroneous, and which would not, therefore, have been recognized in any transaction with a foreign State.

In America, a contrary course has been pursued. The two commissioners nominated on the part of the United States to the commission under the sixth article, have finally claimed the right to invalidate, by their dissent, both the principles and the effect of the decisions of the majority, and have at length, by completely withdrawing from the Board, endeavored, as far as in them lay, to arrest all its proceedings.

In this state of things, the question of good faith and reciprocal execution of treaty can admit of no doubt.

Under the commission for losses by capture, a majority, consisting of three American commissioners, acting upon their oaths, has admitted American claims, and has rejected British, in contradiction to the opinions of the two British commissioners, and of the British Government. In all these decisions, the British Government has acquiesced. Under the commission for debts, a majority, consisting of three British commissioners, acting also upon their oaths, has sanctioned British claims, and rejected American defences, in contradiction to the opinions both of the two American commissioners and of the Government of the United States. On what ground of justice or good faith can the United States hesitate to abide by the arbitration to which they have agreed; or deny to the British subject the benefit of the same principle, the benefits of which have been already received by their own citizens?

It was neither required, nor even imagined, that the opinions of either commission could be unanimous on points on which the two Governments had found it impossible to agree. In both of them possible differences of opinion were foreseen, and they were provided for in both by the stipulation which gave full force and validity to the acts of the majority.

The secession of the two American commissioners can afford no ground to their Government for declining to execute its solemn engagements. If those gentlemen have chosen to relinquish the duty which they undertook, this case is also provided for by the stipulation of the treaty, the eighth article of which contains a stipulation directly applicable to these very circumstances, and expressly points out in what manner the places of commissioners absenting themselves are to be supplied.

Nothing, therefore, can of right remain to be done on this subject, but that the Government of the United States should supply the means of executing its own engagements by nominating (as the treaty prescribes) two fresh commissioners to act with the remaining three, and by instructing them to repair by their diligence the injurious loss which the British creditors have already sustained by the long delay which the conduct of their predecessors has occasioned.

To attempt, instead of this, to enter into a new discussion on the merits of the particular decisions of either commission, would be to abrogate the present treaty, and to transfer the questions back again to negotiation between the same parties, who, from their past experience of the impossibility of coming to a satisfactory conclusion upon them, have long since mutually agreed to submit to an arbitration.

This objection applies not only to all retrospective examination of the particular cases already decided, but also with equal force to any such prospective explanations as may tend to prejudge, by a positive stipulation, the judgment of the sworn commissioners respecting any of the points on which the claimants and defendants are at issue.

The injustice of such a revision might, perhaps, be thought more striking and palpable in those cases where, by the award of the sworn arbitrators, a new ground of right has actually accrued to the claimant. But it would be no less unjust in principle to deprive the other creditors, whose cases are yet undecided, of their share in the benefit of the treaty, and to take from them, by an ex post facto agreement, the advantages of that full discretion which the treaty has already vested in the commissioners.

This view of the case must preclude any detailed discussion of the principles adopted by either commission; or of such explanatory rules as might be proposed on either side, to limit their future discretion, or to revise their past judgments.

Nor is there any ground to hope that such discussions, even if they were not liable to the strong objections already stated, would lead to any satisfactory conclusion between the two Governments. The points in question are for the most part those on which they have already and uniformly differed, and, from the difficulty of deciding which, they agreed to abide by the judgment of arbitrators. The articles contained in the paper delivered by Mr. King, so far from diminishing, tend to increase that difficulty: for they bring forward pretensions, some of which had not before been advanced in discussion between the Governments, and were not expected to be so advanced: they limit, beyond all reasonable construction, the description of the persons entitled to benefit by the treaty: they impose conditions of proof, not only unreasonable, but in some cases manifestly impossible to be complied with, and they prejudge (uniformly to the injury of the British creditors) the most important questions concerning the nature, effect, and duration of those impediments by which, contrary to treaty, the recovery of their just debts has been prevented.

No reason is assigned why these particular questions should be selected from among the great number which must arise out of the causes brought before the commissioners, and should be specially exempted from their jurisdiction by an extraordinary interposition of the two Governments. Nor is any expectation held out that such interposition, had it been possible to have admitted it with respect to these questions, could be confined to these alone. Fresh differences of opinion must naturally arise in the execution of so complicated and detailed a business. The minority on either side, encouraged by this proceeding, would again secede; fresh interpositions would be required from the Governments; till, at length, nothing would be concluded without their intervention, except in those cases only where the five commissioners should be unanimous.

Nor would these inconveniences be confined to the commission under the sixth article alone. The principle of reciprocity, and the evident parity which, by the whole tenor of the treaty, is established between the two commissions, would require that the same course of proceeding should be applied to the commission for captures as to that for debts.

All the past decisions made by the majority in that commission, contrary to the opinions of their colleagues and of the British Government, must therefore undergo a like revision. The compensations actually paid to Americans must be refunded; the British claims rejected (in the opinion of the British Government) without sufficient reason must be re-examined; the principles adopted by the majority must become matter of fresh negotiation between the two Governments; and explanatory rules must be proposed and treated of, limiting, according to the opinions of the parties, those awards which the treaty has referred to the judgment of arbitrators.

From such a course as this nothing can arise but endless dissension between the two countries.

Had the proposals delivered by Mr. King been confined, after the example of what was done here, to such rules of practical convenience and arrangement of business as might have smoothed and facilitated the execution of the treaty, without interfering with its principles, the same disposition which was shown in the former instance would in this case also have induced His Majesty's Government cheerfully to depart from the strict ground of right with a view to good understanding and conciliation, whenever such a conduct was not incompatible with the claims of justice. But it is impossible not to perceive that the explanatory articles are of a totally different nature; that they are not only not warranted by the proceeding here, but are in direct contradiction to it; and that they affect the very essence of the treaty itself, by prejudging the most important questions which the commissions are appointed and sworn to decide.

The last of those articles, that which proposes a change in the persons constituting the Board, is therefore the only one which affords to His Majesty's Government any opportunity of manifesting a conciliatory disposition, without injury to the manifest rights of the King's subjects.

His Majesty is very far from seeing ground to entertain any other sentiment than that of approbation, respecting the conduct of the British commissioners in America, who have, with great ability, diligence, and integrity, discharged a most laborious and difficult duty, under circumstances of peculiar and unexpected embarrassment.

But His Majesty perceives that the disagreements between the persons composing the present Board have proceeded so far, to render it less likely that the business should satisfactorily proceed in their hands than in those of persons to be newly appointed. His Majesty, therefore, always wishing to contribute to conciliation and harmony, does not object to the proposal of withdrawing the present commissioners, and of forming, under the conditions proposed, a new Board, to execute the same duty, and to be invested with the same discretion, which the treaty has given to the present commission.

To that Board, either constituted as the present is, or with the alteration which might be made by allowing each Government to nominate one only of its subjects, and reciprocally, one person taken from the other country, His Majesty would consent to refer all the questions now brought forward by the Government of the United States, as well as every other point respecting the execution of the sixth article; preserving always, in order to avoid needless delays and expenses, the evidence which has been given before the present Board, but agreeing that the new commissioners should be no further bound by the resolutions of the present Board than as it might concur in them, with the exception only of ultimate decisions finally made in any particular case, which, as with respect to such case, could not, as His Majesty thinks, be reversed without manifest injustice.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, December 13th, 1800.

DEAR SIR:

Parliament is still in session, and chiefly employed in devising means to economize and increase the food of the country, whose embarrassments are increased by the various impediments which will materially diminish the supplies expected from the north of Europe. America is the only country from which a considerable and certain importation is looked for; and such is the deficiency of corn, that all we can spare, and of every species, will find here a high and certain market.

I am not unmindful that the present is a favorable moment for the discussion of the questions of disagreement between us and this Government; and, in one or two conferences with Lord Grenville, I have thought I perceived a temper which promises rather more than I have of late been accustomed to expect; but owing to his constant engagements between the business of Parliament, and the duties of his office, I have not yet been able to make any positive progress in the negotiation. Having long believed that Governments which have distinctly expressed an opinion upon a controverted point are rarely induced to change it by reasons which are subsequently presented, I have preferred to begin with the proposal to get rid of the sixth article, instead of renewing the attempt to explain and amend it. This has been done in a way that will not prejudice our demand of an explanatory article, should we fail to agree upon terms which will wholly supersede it. Having mentioned to Lord Grenville that I was authorized to consent to the payment of a precise sum, in lieu of whatever might, pursuant to the sixth article, be awarded against the United States, and he having consented to discuss any proposition to that effect which I might offer, I prepared and sent to him the annexed paper. He has since informed me that measures have been taken on his part, with a view to ascertain how far my estimates are correct, adding, that as soon as he is able to proceed, he will give me notice, in order that we may resume our conferences. In the meantime, some other points are brought forward, and put in a train for discussion. But I am bound to add, that so little progress has yet been made, and all that has passed has been of so general a nature, that nothing with certainty can be inferred in respect to the issue of the negotiation.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

It seems impracticable to ascertain, with any degree of precision, the amount of debt due at any one time from American debtors to British creditors, and every estimate must, therefore, be liable to considerable uncertainty. As the debt arose from the supply of goods furnished by British merchants, the list of British exports seems to offer the best materials for forming an estimate. So far as the American merchants and planters purchased their goods in England with cash, which, to a limited extent, they are understood to have done, the list of exports will require correction; as the value of the goods paid for before they were exported, should be taken from the aggregate amount of the exports, in order to ascertain the value of goods annually supplied on credit. It is reasonable to infer from a long series of annual credits, a correspondent series of annual payments; but although the payments may be supposed to have nearly kept pace with and balanced the new debt annually contracted, since otherwise the trade would have been discontinued, it is, nevertheless, probable that there was, at all times, an average arrearage of old and doubtful debts, upon the recovery of which there was little reliance, and against the loss whereof the creditors indemnified themselves in the prices at which their goods were charged. It may, however, seem proper to make some allowance on account of these doubtful debts, in forming an estimate of the amount of the American debt at the breaking out of the war. As it is wholly uncertain at what sum this arrearage should be estimated, it seems to be a fair manner of disposing of it, to place its uncertain amount against the equally uncertain amount of the goods paid for by American merchants and planters before their exportation, and which should be deducted from the value of the annual exports, if the amount thereof be taken as the amount of new debt annually contracted. Assuming, then, which may be done without much risk of error, the average amount of the annual exports of Great Britain to the United States, for a certain number of years before the war, as the best evidence of the amount of the debt due from American debtors to British creditors when the war commenced, it remains only to ascertain the average amount of the exports, in order to fix the amount of the debt.

Mr. Chalmers, in his Estimate of the Comparative Strength of Great Britain, states the average exports of British manufactures to the United States, for six years ending with 1774, (the period immediately preceding the war,) at	£2,216,324
If this sum be increased by one-fifth, (which is a large proportion) on account of goods not of British manufacture,	443,264
The result will stand at,	2,659,588
Lord Sheffield states the average exports of England to the United States for ten years, ending with 1770, at	1,763,409
If this sum be increased by adding one-fourth of the amount of the whole exports of Scotland, estimated at eight hundred thousand pounds,	200,000
The result is,	1,963,409
The average of the two estimates gives an annual export of	£2,311,498

A sum that probably approaches pretty near the true amount of the American debt at the period before mentioned.

If the condition of the debtors, the influence of the war, and, above all, the operation of the paper money, be understood and considered, it will be thought a moderate estimate that the British creditors suffered a loss of fifty per cent. upon the whole of their debt, by the insolvency of the debtors, between the commencement and conclusion of the war. To judge from the proportion recovered by the creditors in those parts of the United States, in which it is not pretended that any legal impediments have stood in their way, the loss by insolvency, during the war, would come nearer to two-thirds than to one-half of the original debt. Estimating it at one-half, the debt, on the return of peace, would be one million one hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-nine pounds.

As in a majority of the States, including the large commercial towns, the creditors have experienced no material difficulties in collecting their debts, it is reasonable to believe, that at least as much as one-half of the sum which the debtors were able to pay at the close of the war, has since been recovered. This deduction would leave five hundred and seventy-seven thousand eight hundred and seventy-four pounds of the sum due at the return of peace, which, by the addition of interest, having nearly doubled itself, may now amount to the sum of one million one hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-nine pounds.

The amount of the claims exhibited at Philadelphia will not serve to invalidate the foregoing observations, when it is understood, besides their general and acknowledged inaccuracy, some of them presenting only the debtor side of the account, and others no account at all, that these claims include the debts due from persons insolvent before the war, as well as from those who became so during its continuance; so that, without the trouble of a particular examination, it will be found that they will rather corroborate than weaken the preceding estimates.

If it could be ascertained how much of this sum can be recovered of the debtors, the difference would show the amount for which the creditors have a claim upon the United States.

Notwithstanding the complaints of the creditors, it is certain that such of them as have taken the requisite pains have been gradually recovering their debts; and it is probable that their success would at this time have been much more complete, had they not, in many instances, been seduced from the pursuit of their judicial remedies, by the expectation they believed themselves authorized to entertain, from the proceedings of the Board of Commissioners at Philadelphia. At present, no legal impediments obstruct their suits; and, from the general prosperity of every part of the United States during the last ten years, there is reason to conclude that the circumstances of British debtors have improved in common with those of their neighbors.

The debt still outstanding is chiefly due in those States which produce the principal staple articles of American commerce; the aggregate value of which articles, exported from the five southern States, from the year 1700 to 1770, exceeded, according to Lord Sheffield's tables, by ten millions sterling, the aggregate value of the goods imported into those States from Great Britain during the same period. Another circumstance, in respect to the ability of the debtors, deserves consideration. In most of the States the British debtors were American merchants, who resided in the large towns, and sold their goods on credit to the traders and shopkeepers dispersed throughout the country. When the paper money had depreciated, the country traders and shopkeepers paid their debts to the American merchants, who, having no way of making remittances to their British creditors, lost, by further depreciation, the payments received from their debtors, and the chief means of paying their own debts. In some of the States, including those from whence the largest portion of the remaining debt is supposed to be due, it was the usual practice, that a partner or agent of the British house came with the goods to America, where he retailed them on credit among the planters, and, being on the spot, received his payment in the productions of the country. On the breaking out of the war, these partners and agents returned to Great Britain, and thereby avoided the payment of their debts in a medium which finally suffered a ruinous depreciation: their debtors were numerous, and in general owed but moderate sums, and, though sufferers in the course of the war, by the loss of slaves, and the dilapidation of their estates, their property was not diminished in an equal degree with that of the American merchants, who received, in a depreciated paper the debts upon which they depended to pay their British creditors.

The tendency of these reflections is to prove that, in the present unobstructed course of justice, the creditors may be able, with the care and diligence which it is their duty to employ, to recover a great proportion of their outstanding debts: if this proportion should be equal, as it is believed it would be, to two-thirds of the whole, the claim against the United States would not exceed four hundred thousand pounds.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, November 22, 1800.

"I have duly received your letters to No 5, inclusive. Soon after the receipt of No. 2, which was not before the sixth instant, I sent a note to Lord Grenville, informing him that I was ready, in consequence of the answers I had received to my despatches transmitting to America what had passed between him and me concerning the sixth article, to resume our conferences upon that subject. His lordship appointed an early day for this purpose, but no meeting has yet taken place, owing to his having been wholly engaged in the negotiation for peace begun by Austria."

"Not a moment shall be lost, on my part, in the endeavor to concert a satisfactory arrangement respecting the sixth article of the treaty of amity and commerce; but, as the subject is of inferior consideration it will be obliged to give place to the business which, at present, engrosses the attention of the cabinet."

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, January 17, 1801.

"SIR:

"I wish I could send you a more satisfactory account of the negotiation with this Government with which I am charged. Some time ago, Lord Grenville informed me that, on account of his numerous and pressing engagements, he should be obliged to employ some person to discuss with me the arrangement respecting the sixth article which I had proposed; and, after mentioning Mr. Anstey, one of the commissioners under the seventh article, asked me if I had any objection to confer with him; adding that, although it had occurred to him that any definitive article might better be concluded between himself and me, if I had any scruple in holding the preliminary discussions with Mr. Anstey, he would give him a commission, not only to treat, but to sign. As I preferred that the final decision of the business should remain with Lord Grenville, I signified my acquiescence in the course he had suggested, and several papers have been exchanged between Mr. Anstey and me. Though I cannot yet determine what may be the issue of our discussions, I think I shall be able, in a short time, to ascertain the expectations of this Government. Should a satisfactory conclusion become unattainable in the course in which we are now engaged, it will be my duty to terminate the conferences upon the proposition I have made, and insist upon the justness and propriety of the explanatory articles which we have before demanded."

Extracts of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, February 25, 1801.

"The progress which had been made in our negotiation with this Government was such as must have brought it to a speedy conclusion, had not a change taken place in the Department of Foreign Affairs. That the result would, in the main, have been satisfactory is more than I am authorized to say, though I flattered myself with the hope that it would be so."

"I yesterday received the duplicate of your No. 9. Such is the situation of the negotiation, that we cannot, with propriety, relinquish the attempt to adjust the disagreement respecting the sixth article, upon the principle of paying a sum in lieu of what might be awarded under its provisions."

LONDON, March 7, 1801.

"I am assured that our affairs shall be taken into consideration as soon as the new cabinet is settled; and I am not without hopes that they may be satisfactorily adjusted. Having caused it to be understood that we should not consent to pay more than ten hundred thousand pounds in lieu of what might be awarded under the sixth article, I shall await a decision upon this offer."

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, March 26, 1801.

"In respect to our own affairs, I can do no more than repeat, what I am weary of having repeated to me, that the King's illness, the change of ministers, and the attention to more urgent and indispensable business, have, against the inclination of the Government, hitherto prevented it from coming to a decision concerning them. I have been very lately assured that the business shall be soon taken up; and, as the several points have been fully discussed, a little time only will be requisite to decide them. I have not thought it necessary to send you copies of my correspondence, preferring to transmit it entire, together with the result, whatever it may be, of the negotiation. It will then be seen that I have not been insensible to the disadvantages arising from this delay, which, as far as prudence and decorum would permit, I have endeavored to prevent."

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, April 20, 1801.

DEAR SIR:

Annexed, I have the honor to send you a copy of my correspondence with Mr. Anstey upon the subject of the British debts. Although I might, by an analysis of the claims exhibited at Philadelphia, have been able to add much support to the estimate which I had formed of these debts, I thought it advisable to bring the discussion to a close; as well on account of the little probability that any further arguments which could be offered would be likely to induce Mr. Anstey to acquiesce in an estimate of the debts which should not correspond with a sum that had been named to him, as proper to demand of us, as because it did not appear to me certain that his opinion, upon this subject, would have the same weight with the new ministry as it might have had with their predecessors.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

No. 2.

GLOUCESTER PLACE, January 2, 1800.

DEAR SIR:

I beg leave to accompany this note with a paper for your consideration, agreeably to the plan of proceeding in this business agreed upon between us at our last interview.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

J. ANSTEY.

RUFUS KING, Esq., &c.

No. 3. (1.)

47, GLOUCESTER PLACE, PORTMAN SQUARE, January 2, 1801.

There seems to be no objection to adopting (as far as it will reach) the principle suggested by Mr. King, of taking "a valuation of British exports" as the ground-work of a calculation to be made of the American debt, due to British creditors, at the commencement of the American war; such augmentations being made to any estimate formed on that principle as may be found wanting and necessary to complete the calculation proposed.

Of course it will be an object equally desirable on both sides, "that the valuation of British exports" should be derived from the best possible source of information which the subject matter is capable of.

It is therefore proposed to substitute, in lieu of the estimate suggested by Mr. King, (in his letter to Lord Grenville of the 23d November last) a statement of the actual amount of British exports for three years immediately preceding the war, certified from the office of the Inspector General of His Majesty's customs, subject to such explanations as may be necessary, and at the same time to state such general heads of augmentation as it is conceived will be found indispensably necessary to perfect the estimate, and render it effectual to the object.

From the amount of the debt thus ascertained, or agreed to be due at the commencement of the war, it will come in course to consider the several deductions which it may be necessary to make, with a view to the present state of the debt, on the grounds suggested by Mr. King, and with reference to all circumstances connected with the execution of the fourth article of the treaty of peace, and the predicament of the British creditor under the provisions of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c.

RUFUS KING, Esq. &c.

MILL HILL, MIDDLESEX, January 3, 1801.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Mr. Anstey, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his letter of yesterday. With the view of abridging discussion, Mr. King having, in the paper delivered to Lord Grenville, connected the several estimates with each other, as well as with the result to which they seemed to lead, was in hopes that Mr. Anstey would have been inclined to pursue the same course, in preference to that of bringing forward the several points one after another, for the purpose of separate and successive discussion; a mode of proceeding which it is apprehended will inspire mutual caution, and which may, moreover, give birth to disquisitions more minute than can be made to correspond with the principle upon which it is believed the business may be adjusted. If, however, Mr. Anstey shall continue to be of the opinion that this mode of conducting the negotiation is, under all circumstances, preferable to that of which Mr. King has given the example, Mr. King consents to receive, for the purpose specified in the paper delivered to Lord Grenville, and subject to such correction as the same may, on examination, be found to require, the estimate of the American debt, which Mr. Anstey proposes to derive from the average valuation of British exports to the United States for a number of years before the American war.

JOHN ANSTEY, Esq.

No. 5.

GLOUCESTER PLACE, January 6, 1801.

Mr. J. Anstey has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. King's note of Saturday's date, and takes an early opportunity of expressing an equal desire, on his part, to agree on any mode of conducting the negotiation which may be most likely to answer the object proposed, and at the same time shorten the discussion. It was with this view that he thought it might be more expedient, and perhaps more agreeable to Mr. King, to propose for his consideration, in the first instance, a mode of estimating the debt which might lead to a result more corresponding with Mr. Anstey's ideas of the amount, than to begin with observations in detail upon Mr. King's statement, which, from the different point of light in which Mr. Anstey inclines to view the subject, might ultimately lead him to the very ground upon which he conceives it may be desirable to commence the business.

The amount of debt at the period of the war being ascertained or agreed, Mr. Anstey has no desire to draw into discussion more of the circumstances connected with the subject than may appear absolutely necessary, but will confine himself chiefly to the consideration of the several heads of deduction proposed by Mr. King: at the same time he does not hesitate to remark that he by no means inclines to think at any valuation of British exports calculated upon a credit of one year only, upon an average of a given number of years, will furnish any thing like an adequate criterion of the debt, as it stood at the commencement of the war.

In his paper, No. 1, Mr. Anstey proposed, "as a groundwork of the estimate, a statement of the actual amount of British exports for the three years immediately preceding the war, subject to explanation." Accordingly, he has the honor to present at this time the accompanying paper, (No. 2,) together with the statement of British exports therein alluded to, certified from the office of the Inspector General of His Majesty's customs.

P. S. All the names of the Glasgow committee of merchants which have come to Mr. Anstey's knowledge, in addition to those mentioned by Mr. King, are Messrs. Gilbert Hamilton, Robert Findlay, and Alexander Oswald.

RUFUS KING, Esq. &c. &c.

No. 6. (2.)

Paper accompanying statement of exports certified from the customs.

Mr. King will observe, that the statement, certified from His Majesty's customs, comprehends the term of ten years, prior to the 5th of January, 1776. The term, however, of three years, immediately preceding the war, is, perhaps, as much as it may be necessary to implicate in the question.

It will be seen that the amount of each of these three years is made up to the time above mentioned, with reference to two distinct and established modes of valuation: the one entitled the official value, and the other the real value: the former purports to be the custom house valuation of the individual articles actually exported, according to a standard established at a remote period, (above a century ago) viz: in 1669, and is, of course, infinitely below the selling price of the same articles in Great Britain at the time they were actually exported. The real value, as stated, is made up (as is mentioned at the foot of the certificate) with relation "to the proportions which the custom house valuation of the same quantities of similar articles has been found to bear to the real value as ascertained by reference to the declaration of the merchants under the convoy act." Upon which it is obvious to remark, that the convoy act was passed since the credit was given for the debt in question; and that, what is entitled the real value of the same articles at this time must, in general, have been considerably enhanced, in the course of twenty-five years, above the price at which they were shipped for exportation; the natural effect of the alteration in the value of money compared with the selling prices of the articles; an observation equally applicable to both statements.

It is, therefore, proposed to balance the amount of the official value against the amount of the real value, as stated, in order to arrive at a middle proportion which may approach, as nearly as possible, to the actual value of the exports from Great Britain for the three years previous to the war.

It is understood that the course of the trade to the American colonies was to allow of three years' credit upon articles of British export. It is proposed, however, to assume, only for the present, (as the groundwork of the calculation) the actual amount of the two years' valuation of exports; of which the credits of the first year, immediately preceding the war, (dated with reference to the custom house year, ending the 5th of January, 1775) may be considered as the unquestionable debt fixed by the war; which having suddenly broken in upon the credits, immediately after they were given, suspended the course of the payments altogether.

The credits given on the exports of the next preceding year may be taken as the ordinary annual arrear of good debt, due and payable according to the course of the trade, and the credits which arose on the exports of the third or remaining year may be reserved to be taken into consideration, with reference to the head of deductions suggested by Mr. King, on the score of the doubtful debt of each year, insolvency during the war, and of the old arrearages of desperate debts for any antecedent period.

To the amount of the actual exports, for the two last years before the war, it is proposed, that such augmentations shall be made as may be necessary to perfect the estimate of the whole amount of debt due to British merchants and others, His Majesty's subjects, at that period, under the following heads of augmentation, viz:

1st. On account of debts due such of His Majesty's subjects, loyalists, and others, who were not traders, and whose debts cannot be comprehended in any estimate of British exports.

2d. Augmentation on the score of credits given for importations of West India produce from the British West India islands, into the colonies, before the war, also not included in any estimate of British exports.

3d. Augmentation on the score of incidental charges, inseparable from the nature of export traffic; namely, the expenses of freighting, landing, and delivery, and warehousing goods, insurance, commission, &c.

4th. Augmentation on the score of mercantile profit, also not included in the statement of British exports.

5th. Augmentation on the score of interest, to the extent proposed by Mr. King in his letter of the 23d November last.

Inspector General's Office, Custom House, London, December 13, 1800.

WILLIAM IRVING,
Inspector General of the Imports and Exports of Great Britain.

No. 8.

Mill Hill, Middlesex, January 6, 1801.

Mr. King has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Anstey's note of this date, and as he may possibly misconceive its import, takes the liberty of proposing to Mr. Anstey a conference, in order to ascertain its precise meaning. For this purpose, Mr. King will be glad to see Mr. Anstey at half after eleven o'clock to-morrow, in Cumberland Place.†

John Anstey, Esq.

No. 9.

Great Cumberland Place, January 8, 1801.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Mr. Anstey, and for the purpose of assisting the discussion in which they are engaged, requests Mr. Anstey to furnish him with an annual account of the imports into Great Britain from the colonies, now forming the United States of America, from the 5th of January, 1766, to the 5th of January, 1776, distinguishing the imports from Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland, from those of the other colonies, as well as the imports of each of the said five colonies separately.

If the quantity of rice, indigo, and tobacco could be specified, in addition to the value of the whole imports, the statement would be deemed more perfect; if the value only be given, it is requested that the rule of valuation be explained.

If the Inspector General of the imports and exports have the means of making out an account for the above period of ten years, of the exports from the said colonies, with the like distinctions as are above stated in respect to Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland, such account would be useful.

Mr. King will likewise be obliged to Mr. Anstey to furnish him, from the office of the Inspector General, with a dissection of the account of exports from Great Britain to the colonies now forming the United States, which he sent to Mr. King in his note of the 6th instant, distinguishing the amount, according to the official value as well as the convoy value of the exports to Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, and Maryland, from those to the other colonies, as well as the amount of the exports to each of the said five colonies separately.

No. 10.

Gloucester Place, January 8, 1801.

Mr. J. Anstey presents his compliments to Mr. King, has received his note of this morning, and has forwarded an application for the papers Mr. King has deemed necessary to the better ascertaining the immediate object of the present discussion, which Mr. Anstey conceives to be simply to establish, in the first instance, on the best possible ground, the amount in value of the British exports to the American colonies, for a given number of years preceding the war, conformably to the principle of estimating the American debt proposed by Mr. King in his letter of the 23d November last, and adopted in Mr. Anstey's paper of the 6th instant.

Though Mr. Anstey does not directly foresee in what manner the details of British imports prior to the war, requested by Mr. King, will apply to the subject immediately in question, he has lost no time in forwarding Mr. King's request, that the answer he expects the honor of receiving from Mr. King, to his paper of the 6th instant, may (as far as regards himself,) experience as little delay as possible; he is fearful, however, that the specifications required may occupy some considerable time in preparing at the custom house.

R. King, Esq. &c.

No. 11.

Mill Hill, January 10, 1801.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Mr. Anstey, and has the honor to send him the following observations, arising from the consideration of his note of the 6th instant. Mr. Anstey, in this communication, aims at the establishment of two points: first, the substitution of a more authentic statement of the annual exports of Great Britain to America, before the year 1776, in lieu of one derived from the accounts of Lord Sheffield and Mr. Chalmers; and secondly, a more correct estimate of the debt due from American debtors to British creditors, in the place of the

* The above account has been prepared for ten years antecedent to 5th January, 1776. As the books of this office are made up annually to the 5th of January of each succeeding year, it is therefore impossible to make an annual return, in terms of the order, from the middle of the year. The real value of the respective articles exported in each year, during the period above mentioned, has been estimated by the proportion which the custom house valuation of the same quantities of similar articles has been found to bear to the real value, as ascertained by the declarations of the merchants under the convoy act.

† Conference held the next day.

estimate drawn up by Mr. King. The principles upon which Lord Sheffield and Mr. Chalmers prepared their accounts of the exports to America were probably such as, in their opinion, gave to those accounts a title to public confidence. Lord Sheffield says, his tables were made up from official documents; and the statements of both possess the advantage of having been composed before the present war, in the course of which the price of almost every article has experienced a sudden and irregular advance.

Mr. Anstey proposes to ascertain the value of the exports of the years 1773 and 1774, by taking the mean of what the Inspector General calls the official and the real value of the articles exported in those years; the official valuation being stated to be the true value of the goods about the beginning of the last century, and the real valuation their true value at the present time.

Upon the supposition that the advance in the price of commodities has been uniformly progressive from the beginning to the end of the century, the application of the mean difference to the exports of 1773 and 1774 would not have the effect of augmenting their true value: but so far from the increase in prices having been uniformly progressive throughout the century, the advance has been greater in the course of the last thirty years than during the seventy years which preceded; and for the purpose of ascertaining the true value of commodities at the commencement of the American war, it is believed that the addition of a third of whatever increase they may have experienced in the course of the century, would be more correct than the addition of one-half. This opinion rests for its support, first, upon the extraordinary depreciation of money within the last thirty years, owing to the increase of specie or of its representative; and, secondly, upon the increased demand for British manufactures, arising from the derangement, during present war, of the manufactures of the continent. Notwithstanding the estimates, drawn from the accounts of the Inspector General, vary so materially from those which have been deduced from the accounts of Lord Sheffield and Mr. Chalmers, and the reason there is to suppose that this variation proceeds in a considerable degree from the present high price of commodities and low value of money, the former possess an official character, which gives them a preference over the latter; and if what in the Inspector General's statement is called the official value be corrected according to the above suggestion, his account may be admitted as the ground-work of future discussion.

In respect to the second point, the substitution of a more correct estimate of the American debt at the breaking out of the American war, it will, in the first place, be necessary, according to the principle by which it is agreed that the estimate shall be formed, to ascertain the term of credit which was given by the British to the American merchants. Mr. Anstey suggests, that it is understood to have been a credit of three years; a supposition which refutes itself by the excessive amount to which an estimate formed upon this principle would carry the debt. Fortunately, this point, which is of primary importance, admits of the most satisfactory proof; and the result of an extensive inquiry upon this head, among the British merchants formerly engaged in this trade, has been a uniform opinion that the credits in some cases were for nine months, but in none for more than twelve months. Although the credits were for a year, yet it should be recollected that the exports were made, not all at once, but half yearly; or, in other words, the goods exported within a year were divided into two parts, one of which arrived in America in the spring, and the other in the fall. The effect of this division was to reduce the aggregate credit to an average of only nine months; for when the spring goods arrived, half the term of credit upon those of the preceding fall had expired; and, in like manner, when the fall goods arrived, half the term of credit upon those of the preceding spring had expired. A year was the term of credit assumed by Mr. King, in his note of the 23d November, and he has not discovered, from subsequent investigation, that this term requires enlargement.

Admitting that the credits did not exceed a year, still, in case an habitual course prevailed, by which, in effect, the credit operated for a longer term, the inference proposed to be drawn from the limitation of a year will in some degree be unsupported. It becomes necessary, therefore, to pursue the inquiry a little further, for the purpose of ascertaining how far the payments were, in fact, made within the term of the credit. Not only the limitation of the credit, but the nature and course of the trade, must be received as evidence of perodical payments, which, though not precisely punctual or complete, must, in a long succession of years, have nearly kept pace with the new debt annually contracted. This observation will be found to apply with peculiar force to the southern States, from which the principal part of the remaining debt is supposed to be due. These States produce the chief staple commodities exported from the United States. By the English navigation act, their trade was essentially confined to the parent country, and nearly the whole of their produce was sent to Great Britain, in like manner as the produce of the British West Indies continues to be sent. In reference to the point under consideration, it is certainly pertinent to remark that this restraint upon the planters and provincial merchants, to send the colonial productions to foreign markets, had the effect to secure the payment of debts due in Great Britain, inasmuch as the prohibition operated in the nature of a mortgage upon the annual crops in favor of the British creditors, whose agents took care to collect and send them to their principals: to conclude upon this point, if the annual credits did not exceed the value of the annual crops, which, in respect to the southern States, the account of exports will prove to have been the fact; and if the crops were sent to Great Britain, and the navigation act prohibited their going to a foreign market, the conclusion seems unavoidable that the payments, in effect, kept pace with the credits.

Supposing it to be ascertained that the credits and payments were annual, still, the following objections against the assumption of the value of the annual exports, as the standard of the contemporary debt, require to be considered.

First. The whole of the exports were not upon credit, part of them being paid for in cash, which part should be deducted, if the value of the entire exports be assumed as the standard of the debt annually contracted.

Second. Besides the debt annually contracted, there at all times existed a given sum, of old or outstanding debt, which should be added to the value of the annual exports, if the same be taken as the standard of the contemporary debt.

In respect to the first of these objections, it has never been doubted that a portion of the annual exports to America was purchased with cash: the proportion which such purchases bore to the whole has been the subject of a variety of opinions. Lord Sheffield estimates it at one-fifth; others may decide in favor of a greater proportion. Exclusive of men of good estates, and who had no occasion for credit, the merchants of America, like those of other countries, had, without doubt, acquired riches; and whether we regard the number and tonnage of the American ships, or other visible tokens of property in their possession, before the American war, we must be persuaded that, to a certain degree, they had the means, and, if so, they employed them to purchase their supplies with cash instead of credit. In this view of the objection, it is presumed that the estimate of Lord Sheffield will not be thought extravagant.

With regard to the second objection, it will not be alleged that the crops were always the same, or that the annual debt was regularly discharged, according to the terms of the credit; notwithstanding the general course of the trade, a given arrearage of old debt was, without doubt, always outstanding: its amount, which must have varied in different States, and in the same State at different times, cannot be satisfactorily ascertained. The reasoning which has been offered in favor of the adoption of the value of the annual exports as the standard of the contemporary debt, may satisfy us that this arrearage could not have been very considerable. Should it be estimated, at the commencement of the American war, at a fifth, or even at a fourth of the new or annual debt, it may be balanced against the proportion of annual exports purchased with cash; and thus the value of a year's exports will continue to be the standard by which to estimate the debt at the breaking out of the war.

It remains only to consider the augmentations suggested by Mr. Anstey, under the following heads: 1. The debt due to the loyalists. 2. The debt for goods imported from the British West Indies. 3. The debt for freight, commissions, &c. 4. The debt for mercantile profit; and 5. The debt for interest.

A few observations will suffice upon these topics.

First head. Something may be added on account of debts due to loyalists. These claims, in general, divide themselves into two classes: those which are desperate on their merits, as the claims of Mr. Penn, and of the heirs of Lord Baltimore, which, relating to real estates, have been decided not to be included within the provisions of the treaty of peace; and, secondly, those which are allowed to be well founded, and against the recovery of which, in the ordinary course of justice, no impediments are supposed to exist.

Second head. Instead of any thing being due for goods imported from the British West Indies, the course of that trade yielded a cash balance; and, for several years before the war, according to Lord Sheffield's tables, this balance amounted to three hundred and fifty thousand pounds annually. It probably exceeded that sum, and formed an important remittance to Great Britain in payment of the annual debt.

Third head. The Americans were their own freighters: the goods, as soon as shipped, became their property, and were at their risk. Commissions are never charged on goods sold: nothing can, therefore, be added under this head.

Fourth head. Mercantile profit upon goods sold in Great Britain is included in the price, or, what is the same thing, in the custom-house valuation: nothing, therefore, can be added on this account.

Fifth head. An addition on account of interest is certainly to be made.

Should Mr. Anstey agree in the justness of the foregoing observations, upon a subject which claims the liberal consideration of all parties, and which can only be decided upon general principles, the discussion will be closed upon the rule, by which the amount of the American debt, at the breaking out of the war, is to be ascertained. It will then be in course to consider of the deductions to be made from this sum, on account of insolvencies during the war, and payments since; as well as of the addition to be made on account of interest, and of the debts due to loyalists.

GLOUCESTER PLACE, PORTMAN SQUARE, January 17, 1801.

Mr. Anstey presents his compliments to Mr. King. Has the honor to accompany this note with a paper of observations, in reply to Mr. King's communication of the 10th instant.

In the course of a day or two, Mr. Anstey will beg leave to trouble Mr. King with an additional paper of remarks upon the remaining topics, and will close the discussion on the subject of the estimate, upon which, should it be approved of, the deductions proposed by Mr. King will be allowed to operate upon such a liberal scale as, it is hoped, will admit of a satisfactory adjustment of the business.

No. 15. (3.)

GLOUCESTER PLACE, PORTMAN SQUARE, January 17, 1801.

Mr. Anstey has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. King's communication under date of the 10th instant, and to submit the following observations upon it.

The fact mutually regarded as of the first importance to be ascertained, is the amount of the American debt as it stood at the commencement of the war; the truth, as near as it can be approached, must be an object equally desirable on both sides; the fact will, therefore, be sought for rather than contested upon the present occasion.

Mr. King has candidly acknowledged that a preference is due to the statement from the office of the Inspector General, on account of the official character it bears; it is not, however, upon any ground that affects the public confidence to which Lord Sheffield's and Mr. Chalmers's statements may be justly entitled that Mr. Anstey conceives the statements from the office of the Inspector General of His Majesty's customs may be more safely relied on, with a view to the information immediately applicable to the point in question.

The fact sought for from the statements in Lord Sheffield's tables (which refer to a distinct term of ten years, prior to the year 1770,) can only be approached by inference and analogy to the supposed amount of exports at a subsequent period, or supplied, with reference to Mr. Chalmers's statement, for ten years prior to the war, calculating (as proposed by Mr. King) an average upon an average by blending both periods together; by which process, half the term of the last average is unnecessarily twice calculated upon; and from the whole, a result is concluded varying, as Mr. King justly observes, very materially from the accounts of the Inspector General, but which, Mr. Anstey conceives, is liable to a greater risk of uncertainty than the estimate proposed to be substituted in their stead.

In the Inspector General's account, the fact itself, which is to form the ground-work of the estimate of the American debt, is officially found, and certified as the amount of the actual exports for three years immediately preceding the war. Upon this ground-work the estimate of the American debt is agreed to be raised. But Mr. King proposes a correction of the method suggested by Mr. Anstey (of estimating the value of the exports, by taking a middle proportion, between what is termed the official and the real value in the Inspector General's certificate,) by adding one-third only of the balance of the two valuations to the official statement, in lieu of a moiety as proposed by Mr. Anstey; for which correction of the plan proposed, are assigned all the general reasons already considered, and stated by Mr. Anstey, which, in his view of the subject, justified the addition of a moiety, upon a liberal principle of an equal division of the excess; and also a conjecture that the advance in the price of the articles, during the last century, has been greater in respect of the last thirty years than for the seventy years preceding. It is believed that the fact, could it be mathematically proved, would justify the principle of adding even more than a moiety, in preference to confining the official estimate to the addition only of one-third of the balance.

But Mr. Anstey, not being aware of the ground upon which it is proposed to adopt the principle of a third, in preference to any other given proportion, will beg leave to suggest, in support of his proposal of confining it to a moiety, that, although (as already admitted in his paper, No. 2,) what is entitled the real value "must, in general, have been considerably enhanced in the course of the last twenty-five years, above the price at which the same articles were shipped for exportation in the years 1773 and 1774," the fact is not universally true, and in every instance. Some articles of British manufacture, it is presumed, have by no means increased in value in the proportion imagined by Mr. King. Cotton, in particular, it is believed, bore as great a price in the year 1774 as it would be estimated at at this day, with reference to the declaration of the merchants under the convoy act. At any rate, it is not considered that "the sudden and irregular advance in the price," which, to a certain extent, is admitted, has been for the last thirty years in any degree equal to two parts out of three of the progressive and accumulative increase of the whole century.

And it must be observed, that, in the proportions assumed of seventy to thirty years, there is a term of five years connected with the latter period more than strictly belongs to it, with reference to the commencement of the war; which term should be added to the seventy years, for the purpose of founding a corrected statement.

* It is deemed unnecessary to insert these diffuse accounts, which are made up agreeably to Mr. King's directions contained in No. 9, with the omission of a return of the exports from the colonies during the same period, the amount whereof the Inspector General had no means of ascertaining. The essential information afforded by the accounts, as applicable to the points under discussion, is stated, by way of illustration, in Mr. King's paper of the 29th January. Vide No. 22.

Assuming, however, the principle of Mr. King's reasoning, and calculating upon his theory, though in the proportion of twenty-five to seventy-five years, instead of thirty to seventy (for twenty-five years will include the whole of the American war, the present war, and the influence of both on the value of money) it is conceived that the result would be precisely the same upon the following process: a coincidence which marks the caution and consideration with which the adoption of the moiety has been proposed. For example:

The official value in the certificate is stated at - - - - - - -	2,843,447
The real value at - - - - - - - - - -	4,420,219
The balance is - - - - - - - - - -	£1,576,772

The moiety of the balance, as proposed by Mr. Anstey, is - - -	788,386
The third of that balance, as proposed by Mr. King, is - - -	525,590
The difference of calculating upon the proportion 75 years to 25 years, instead of 70 to 30 will be found in the proportion that 5 years bears to 30, or one sixth;
The one-sixth of the balance above stated, (viz. of £1,576,772) will be - to be added to the official amount in respect of the five years—	262,795
To which is to be added the one-third of the balance, according to Mr. King's proposal, as above, viz: - - - - - -	525,590
The amount of the two sums, added together, equal the moiety of the original balance, or middle proportion assumed by Mr. Anstey to a fraction, - -		£788,385

Hence it follows, that if, as Mr. King imagines, the advance upon the price of the articles for the last thirty years is more than equal to the gradual advance upon the price for the seventy years preceding, the term of five years, excepted out of the thirty, must be allowed its due weight in the reckoning; and, being taken out of one scale, and thrown into the other, will operate in a double ratio, leaving the scales perfectly even, and establishing the moiety, according to Mr. Anstey's proposal, upon Mr. King's own principles.

With respect to the credit understood to have been allowed in the course of the trade (as supposed by Mr. Anstey,) it is open to him to remark that he by no means meant to infer as if he supposed that no payments whatever were made in the course of the three years from the time of the credit given, or as if it had been understood that the custom of the trade had established a law which justified the debtor in withholding, and precluded the creditor from exacting, payments during that period. Had such meaning been intended by Mr. Anstey, he should have felt it incumbent upon him to have calculated upon it as an established fact; but, on the contrary, the amount of the exports of the third year is expressly reserved, in the succeeding sentence, to be taken into consideration, with reference to a class of deductions proposed by Mr. King, on the score of old arrearages of doubtful and desperate debt, insolvency, &c. In the mean time, without questioning, but, on the contrary, agreeing to the fact, Mr. King states to have ascertained, by recent and extensive inquiry, viz: that it was universally the custom for the British merchant in no instance to allow of more than twelve months' credit; it is conceived, nevertheless, to have been the practice of the American trade to take it for three years, and, in some instances, even for a much longer term. Debts have been suffered to remain outstanding for three or four years, without destroying the credit of the debtor singly on that ground; such continued credit, though not strictly allowed of in the terms of the invoice, was admitted in usage; it was taken in fact, and of course to a certain extent beyond what was allowed of, and acquiesced in by the British merchant as unavoidable, considering the nature of the trade, especially where partial and periodical payments, however inadequate, had been regularly made. It may not be deemed improper to remark in this place, that Lord Sheffield, whose authority is relied on, states "that some of the provinces never paid more than was sufficient to keep up their credit." No ground, however, is taken in the estimate on the supposed credit of three years, whether allowed or acquiesced in by the British merchants, or taken, according to the ordinary custom of payments as practised by the American merchants. Credit is nevertheless taken by Mr. Anstey for the value of two years' exports, distinguishing the amount of the first year, as the ordinary annual arrear of good debt, and that of the last year as the unquestionable debt fixed by the war; and it appears to him that he is fully justified in so doing, by the following reasons, in addition to those above stated.

It was the custom of the British merchant to strike balances upon their accounts current once in every year, and to carry them onward to the succeeding year, frequently taking bonds for the amount, but, at all events, whether bonded or not, these balances were uniformly carried to the account current of the ensuing year, with interest, in most of the provinces at six, and in some, it is said, as high as seven, and even eight per cent. This practice of striking balances upon accounts current once in every year, and carrying them on with interest to the succeeding year, is conformable to the practice of consignees of West India produce at this day; the balances of course fluctuate according to the crops, and sales, and outgoings of the estate, and the bills drawn by the owners. The accumulation of these floating balances form a considerable arrear which constituted a good debt; for it was never considered that these balances, carrying interest, whether bonded or not, were less a part of the debt than the last item in the annual account current: every balance thus fixed, or bonded with interest, gave a new character and credit to the debt every year, and was in the nature of a fresh undertaking on the part of the American trade to discharge it. The old and doubtful debt must still be taken up as a distinct consideration; it seems to go to the merits of particular claims rather than to form a ground of deduction from a general estimate: for so long as the confidence subsisted between debtor and creditor on repeated and continued credits, no debt between such debtor and creditor could be considered as doubtful, much less desperate, and in no sense an old debt, singly on the ground of its being of two years standing only. Circumstances, of course, might vary the credit due to an American debtor, within one month after the delivery of the goods, and exclude him from a share of the next invoice; and, indeed, the very idea of old and doubtful debts must be conceived of and have relation to particular persons, in doubtful and desperate circumstances, to whom credit, once indulged and abused, had ceased to be given altogether; but the estimate, upon the principle of calculating on the amount of exports, proceeds upon general grounds, and, as it regards the value of the exports of the year 1773, necessarily supposes a credit for the invoices of that year lodged somewhere in the American colonies; and thence, upon the whole, the balances of good debt annually re-accredited, (if it may be so expressed,) frequently bonded, but always carrying interest, together with the unsatisfied part of the credit of that year, constituted an arrear of good debt annually brought to account, equivalent, at the least, to the value of the exports of that year.

Undoubtedly the staple produce of the southern States may be regarded as a part of the capital upon which their credit was given; and the navigation act, by confining the trade of some of the southern States entirely to Great Britain, might be considered, to a certain extent, in the nature of a security to the British trader for the application of it to the general account of the invoices, in a series of successive payments, according to the course of the trade. The crops of tobacco were clearly confined to Great Britain; but the staple produce of Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Georgia, were not wholly so. Grain and flour, in particular, were exported to Lisbon; and rice, the principal staple of South Carolina and Georgia, to any port to the southward of Cape Finisterre; but supposing the crops to have been always equally productive, and, what is by no means conceded, that the annual credits did not exceed the value of the annual crops, still the produce of the year 1774, of rice, for instance, which requires to be pounded and prepared, and warehoused, and packed, and transported to Great Britain, would hardly arrive, in that year, in time to balance the arrear of debt of the preceding year. It should be recollected that the question is as to the actual debt, as it stood at the commencement of the war year. If the whole of the crop of 1774 was not shipped, landed, and brought to account in that year, no argument can be drawn from the supposed circumstance of the crop being in the nature of a mortgage for the payment of the contemporary debt: for, as it has been before observed, the war, by breaking in upon the credits, fixed the debt, and suspended the payments altogether.

Mr. King states that the whole of the exports were not upon credit, but part upon cash, equal, according to Lord Sheffield's account, as alluded to by Mr. King, to one-fifth of the whole, which he proposes "to deduct from the amount of the exports." Mr. Anstey has no reason to doubt the accuracy of Lord Sheffield's statement; and most unquestionably there were "in the colonies, exclusive of the men of good estates, who had no occasion for credit, merchants who had acquired wealth, and employed it in ready money purchases of British exports." But it must be allowed that these men were of a totally distinct class and description of people from those who purchased on credit: for cash payments from debtors would not have been considered as ready money payments, but have been credited per contra, and gone in extinguishment of so much of their debt. These, therefore, were persons who traded on their own capital, paid for their goods on the spot, carried them home, and retailed them to their countrymen at advanced prices; and, by multiplying their credits extensively throughout the provinces, placed themselves precisely in the same situation as the London merchants stood with respect to those for whom they shipped their goods upon credit; and, in fact, as all men were, at that time, indifferently British subjects, they stood, with respect to their interest in the contest, and every other circumstance and consideration which might be supposed to influence the conduct of men who had a property to lose, exactly, and in all respects, (the intervention of the sea excepted,) on the same ground as if they had actually resided on the Exchange of London. They became, in fact, by the operation of the alien laws, and other causes conspiring to the same effect, British creditors, in the sense of the fourth article of the treaty of peace, and, to a certain amount, according to the scale of their dealing, upon a ground distinct from that of the London merchant: for their debtors were indebted to them, not only the whole of the invoice price of the articles, but, what will constitute a considerable debt of itself, a great addition of mercantile profit, in which, of course, were included the expenses of freight and insurance, &c. &c., as specified under the head of augmentations. If the ready money payments, by this distinct class of traders, amounted to one-fifth, as Mr. King assumes, upon Lord Sheffield's statement, the necessary result will be that, instead of forming a ground of deduction to set off a supposed arrearage of old debt, the cash payments would justify an increase in the estimate, proportioned to the expenses above alluded to, together with a fair mercantile profit in respect of the fifth part of the exports.

This addition will apply to the third and fourth heads of augmentations proposed by Mr. Anstey, which come now to be considered in the order in which they were stated:

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, January 18, 1801.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Mr. Anstey, and begs him to accept his thanks for the additional accounts furnished by the Inspector General. Mr. King has had the honor to receive Mr. Anstey's note of yesterday, but, as Mr. Anstey proposes, in a day or two, to complete his reply to Mr. King's note of the 10th instant, by sending him some further observations respecting it, Mr. King thinks it proper to wait until the whole of Mr. Anstey's observations are received, before he either forms or expresses any opinion concerning the chief point to which those already sent to him seem to relate.

Should Mr. Anstey pass through Cumberland Place in the course of the morning, Mr. King would be glad to see him; he would call in Gloucester Place, were he not unfortunately confined to his house.

GLOUCESTER PLACE, January 21, 1801.

Mr. Anstey presents his compliments to Mr. King; has the honor to send him, enclosed, a paper, containing remarks on the subject of the augmentations he has conceived to be necessary, in order to perfect the estimate under consideration, to which, Mr. Anstey is of opinion, (and, perhaps, Mr. King will agree with him,) it will be more regular to confine the present communication. Mr. Anstey will, however, do himself the honor of waiting upon Mr. King, for the purpose of conferring with him upon the subjects connected with it on Friday next, between two and and three o'clock, if that hour will be convenient.

No. 18.—Paper No. 4.

47, GLOUCESTER PLACE, January 21, 1801.

Mr. Anstey has the honor to send Mr. King the following remarks, in support of the augmentations proposed to be made to his estimate of the American debt.

First head of augmentation is on the score of the debt due such of the loyalists as were not traders. This distinction is made, because, as the gross amount of the export has been already calculated upon, the debts of such of the American loyalists, who were traders, can only be contemplated with reference to the third and fourth heads of augmentation, on the score of freight and mercantile profit. The loyalists intended in the class now under consideration are those who, not being immediately concerned in the export trade, were still creditors to their own countrymen upon bonds, or otherwise, in their ordinary intercourse, either as it regarded their internal trade, or speculations of various kinds, in land, ship-building, &c. &c. who, from being men of wealth, some of them men of influence, and in public stations, and almost all, in a general sense, obnoxious to the new Government, ranged themselves on the side of Great Britain, and became creditors, in the sense of the fourth article of the treaty of peace.

It would be difficult, at this day, to distinguish those of that description who were traders from those who were not; though, by reference to the several acts of confiscation, the names of many of them might be seen, and distinguished by recollection, were it expedient to go into a detail of this kind; and the amount of their claims, on the score of debts, could be ascertained by Mr. Anstey, if necessary, with great precision. It might be also ascertained, to an extent safely within the truth of the fact, how many persons presented claims, and to what amount, in each case, "on the score of debts," under the acts for granting compensation to the loyalists who suffered losses of property under the general and sweeping clauses of those acts; but all that is here intended is to state general facts, directly applicable to the subject, from which general conclusions may be formed.

The claims for debts by the American loyalists were reported to Government, by the commissioners of American claims, at two millions three hundred and fifty-four thousand, one hundred and thirty-five pounds, twelve shillings, and four-pence, with regard to which the following fact is peculiarly worthy of attention: these claims were exhibited in schedules, attached to a general claim for confiscated property, in each case, (a very few, and those comparatively to a very small amount, only excepted;) from whence it should seem that the debt so claimed belonged to the inhabitants of the colonies, who took part with Great Britain in the contest, and not to the British merchants who resided in Great Britain, and, consequently, cannot be comprehended in any estimate of British exports. The losses in confiscated property were finally liquidated at less than one-third of the amount of the claims. If, therefore, as it has been suggested by Mr. King, the American traders were not, in general, loyalists, something short of one-third of the loyalist debt may be added under the first head of augmentation, on the score of the loyalists who were not traders; and, if they were, then, as loyalists, and also traders, a proportion equal to the mercantile profit upon the British exports which they freighted at their own risk and expense, and the gross amount of which has been already calculated upon in the general estimate.

Second head.—Mr. King observes that, instead of the West India trade having admitted of a balance, chargeable as an augmentation of the estimate, it yielded, according to Lord Sheffield's statement, a cash balance per contra, equal to three hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which afforded an important remittance to Great Britain; on which Mr. Anstey must be allowed to remark, that Lord Sheffield makes his calculation with an eye to the advantage derived from the carrying trade between the colonies and the islands. He states the amount of exports from the colonies to the islands at five hundred thousand pounds, and that of the islands to the colonies at four hundred thousand pounds; leaving a balance only of one hundred thousand pounds. The three hundred and forty-five thousand pounds are made up of this one hundred thousand pounds balance, and the further sum of two hundred and forty-five thousand pounds; calculated as a profit, in effect equal to that sum, arising from the benefit of double freight to "and from the West Indies, interest for the time on the value of the vessel, tear and wear, seamen's wages, provisions, &c., the profit is stated to be thus worth about the sum of three hundred and forty-five thousand pounds a year." But Mr. Anstey does not understand Lord Sheffield as speaking of a cash balance, or indeed of any balance, capable of forming a remittance to Great Britain. If, indeed, there were any cash balance upon a trade, which, upon further inquiry appears to have been carried on chiefly by barter, at a very short credit, it was most natural to suppose it would go in the purchase of negroes; a trade which Lord Sheffield mentions, in another place, was carried on to the colonies upon a British capital to the amount of three hundred thousand pounds. No augmentation, however, will be contended for on on this ground, nor would Mr. Anstey have troubled Mr. King with any further observation on this head, but that, from the whole, an inference arises which, to his mind, perfectly justifies the propriety of an additional charge, on the score of freight and mercantile profit, which Mr. Anstey will beg leave now to consider under the third and fourth heads of augmentation.

Third and fourth head. Upon the subject of freight, Mr. King observes that the Americans "were their own freighters; and, therefore, that nothing is chargeable on this head."

Mr. Anstey agrees that this statement is perfectly correct, as far as regards the London merchants, who traded on commission; but with respect to the Glasgow merchants, it cannot be conceded that freight did not make an article of expense, though perhaps no article of charge eo nomine. It was included in the mercantile profit: the nature of the trade will explain this. It was carried on by the appointment of factors, and the establishment of partnership houses in America, the expenses of the establishments, of factors, warehouses, horses and servants, in addition to all the expenses of freight (in which are contemplated the several charges more particularly specified and enumerated under the last head) justified, and in point of fact constituted, an increase in the price of the article in the hands of the consumer, beyond the selling price in the port of Glasgow; which selling price (and not the invoice price, for that might have been calculated with a view to these charges) is all that is covered by the valuation of exports, in the general estimate submitted. Is it imaginable in trade that the Glasgow merchants, who must have shipped these articles, at their own risk and expense, to their own stores, and consigned them to their own agents, should not at least have indemnified themselves in the retail of those articles in America?

As to the amount of augmentation chargeable on this ground, on so much of the trade as was carried on between Glasgow and the provinces, nothing will be hazarded by Mr. Anstey at this time. Between the colonies and the islands Lord Sheffield states it at forty-five per cent. for the single freight: one-third of that sum might be considered a very moderate augmentation: taking the mercantile profit alone (without expenses of freight) at ten per cent. upon the export price, it would be less than has been adopted, as the proper allowance of mercantile profit, by the Board established under the seventh article of the treaty.

Upon the fifth head of augmentation, Mr. King and Mr. Anstey are agreed.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, January 23, 1801.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Mr. Anstey, and has the honor to send him an extract of the report which he showed him this morning of a conference with Lord Grenville on the 21st of April, 1800. This report was first submitted to Lord Grenville, in order that it might be accurate, and then sent by Mr. King to his Government, which, instead of agreeing in the proposal of paying a sum of between one and two millions in satisfaction of the whole debt due to British creditors, has authorized Mr. King to treat for the payment of a sum in lieu of that which might, under the sixth article of the treaty of amity and commerce, be awarded to be paid by the United States; leaving the creditors to their remedies against the debtors, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace; who, as the courts are now open, and the debtors in better circumstances than at the conclusion of the war, would, without doubt, be able to recover the greatest part of their just debts.

No. 20.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to Colonel Pickering, dated London, April 22, 1800, containing the report of a conference with Lord Grenville, respecting the payment of a gross sum in satisfaction of the whole debt due to British creditors before the American war.

"I then asked Lord Grenville if he had formed any idea of the gross sum on the payment of which they would engage to compensate the claims of the British creditors? His lordship replied that he had not; adding, that he thought the creditors had not been wise in swelling, as they had done, their claim to four or five millions sterling: though it might have no influence upon our Government, it would be likely to have some on the people. That, on the supposition that the debt due to British creditors did not exceed two millions, they might be willing to accept a gross sum of between one and two millions."

GLOUCESTER PLACE, January 23, 1801.

Mr. Anstey having been requested to consider the four hundred thousand pounds mentioned in Mr. King's note to the right honorable Lord Grenville of the 23d November last, as the sum approaching, in his opinion, the nearest to the sum required, of any other which, upon his principle of calculation, ought to be made the subject of the convention intended between the two countries, and to consider the same as a specific offer to that amount, on the part of the United States; and Mr. Anstey being further and earnestly requested, in this stage of the discussion, to meet Mr. King's proposition, with some overture on the part of His Majesty's Government, which may bring the discussion to bear immediately, and at once, as nearly as possible, on the principal point in question; Mr. Anstey has no difficulty in declaring that the sum of four hundred thousand pounds is, in his opinion, a sum much too inconsiderable in itself, and, as it regards the object, altogether inadequate.

Looking at the treaty, and at the estimate he has formed upon Mr. King's principle of calculating upon the exports, and also at the grounds and principles of the augmentations Mr. Anstey has assigned to be necessary in order to perfect that estimate; and having also generally in view (but without any particular examination) the several heads of deduction suggested by Mr. King; Mr. Anstey (for the purpose of meeting Mr. King's wishes in shortening the discussion) proposes to rest upon the general estimate he has had the honor to present to him as the basis of the demand, and to commence the first overtures to a mutual accommodation by a waiver, on his part, of the benefit of all the augmentations to which his estimate may be fairly entitled, not even excepting the interest which, in Mr. King's note of the 23d November last, above mentioned, is conceded to the extent of doubling the debt as it stood at the close of the war, and to place to the account of Mr. King's deductions no less a sum than four millions five hundred and forty-one thousand nine hundred and fifty-two pounds, leaving a balance only of two millions of pounds to be applied to the purposes contemplated by the present negotiation.

This offer to be taken as an entire proposal, and without prejudice to any right of demand to which the subject matter of concession now is, or shall hereafter, upon a future discussion, appear to be justly entitled.

RUFUS KING, Esq. &c.

No. 22.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, January 29, 1801.

Mr. King has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Anstey's note of the 21st instant, and is sorry to perceive that so wide a difference still prevails in their opinions respecting the amount of the American debt at the commencement of the American war. Although the subject is one which, in all its material circumstances, does not admit of precise or rigorous proof, there are, nevertheless, two facts having an important influence upon the point in discussion, which can be established with a degree of certainty precluding all doubt of their authenticity.

The first is the value of the annual exports, which may be satisfactorily ascertained. The second is the term of credit given by the British to the American merchants; a fact, respecting which no disagreement in opinion any longer exists.

In reference to the first point, so far as respects the value of the exports for the years 1772, 1773, and 1774, Mr. King will make but one or two remarks, in addition to those before submitted to Mr. Anstey's consideration. The average excess of the real above the official value of the exports of those years is one million five hundred and forty-nine thousand four hundred and twenty-six pounds, which does not materially vary from the difference between the official and real value of the last of those years which Mr. Anstey has taken as the basis of his calculation. Supposing, for the sake of round numbers, that the goods exported in any one of the three years above mentioned have, in the course of a century, advanced in their price one million and a half sterling, the question to be resolved is, what proportion of that advance accrued in the first seventy years, and what in the last thirty? As the goods of 1772 were ordered and prepared in 1771, which is twenty-nine years before the close of the century, (for the sake of even numbers, Mr. King has taken thirty years instead of twenty-nine) and, for the purpose of this calculation, the difference is unimportant. Upon a revision of the problem, Mr. King sees no reason to doubt the opinion before expressed, that the advance of price has been much greater in the latter than in the former term of years. Were it deemed requisite to run this branch of the discussion into a minute inquiry, recourse might be had to sources of information which, it is believed, would afford pretty satisfactory evidence in favor of Mr. King's estimate, that two parts in three of such advance have taken place within the last thirty years.

Should this appear probable, the fact would justify the addition of a third instead of a moiety of the advance which has taken place in the course of the century.

If Mr. Anstey adverts to the years when the goods were ordered and exported, he will perceive that they preceded one, two, and three years, the epoch of the breaking out of the American war; and that the error which he imputes to Mr. King, in this respect, is not precisely such as he had supposed.

But were it such, if Mr. Anstey will take the trouble to revise the computation he has made upon this subject, he will perceive that it requires correction. Upon the supposition that the advance of price, during the last thirty years, was two-fold greater than during the seventy years preceding, and that the advance in the price of the goods exported in any of the three years above mentioned has, in the course of a century, been equal to one million five hundred and seventy-six thousand seven hundred and seventy-two pounds, it follows that five hundred and twenty-five thousand five hundred and ninety pounds thereof accrued within the seventy years, and double that sum, or one million and fifty-one thousand one hundred and eighty-two pounds within the thirty years. But, if the goods were exported only twenty-five years ago, as erroneously supposed by Mr. Anstey, in order to ascertain their value when exported, the five hundred and twenty-five thousand five hundred and ninety pounds advance of the seventy years, must be increased by the advance of five additional years, or one-sixth part of the advance of the thirty years: that is to say, by one hundred and seventy-five thousand one hundred and ninety-seven pounds, or the one-sixth of one million and fifty-one thousand one hundred and eighty-two pounds; instead of which, Mr. Anstey increases it by two hundred and sixty-two thousand seven hundred and ninety-five pounds, or one-sixth of the advance of the whole century. This double error, first, in withdrawing the five years, and, secondly, in overrating their proportionate value, necessarily disturbs the accuracy of Mr. Anstey's conclusion upon this point.

If it shall be thought equitable to increase the official value of the exports by the addition of a third instead of a moiety of the difference between it and the real value, to complete the estimate, in order that it may be received as the standard of the debt annually contracted, the various heads of deduction and augmentation must be settled.

Mr. Anstey has manifestly misapprehended the whole scope of Mr. King's observations in respect to the goods annually purchased with cash by the American merchants, and on account of which he claimed a correspondent deduction from the amount of the annual exports.

Mr. Anstey supposes that all the American merchants took the side of Great Britain; and, upon that hypothesis, demands an augmentation of the amount of exports under the head of mercantile profit, instead of assenting to the deduction claimed by Mr. King. By American merchants it was by no means intended to comprehend merchants who resided in Great Britain, and traded to America, or the partners, factors, or servants of such merchants, but the native and permanently resident merchants of the country, whose estates and home were in the commercial cities of the United States, and who took the side of America so universally, that the exceptions, which were really few and unimportant, cannot materially affect the fair allowance to be made under this head.

The character and claims of British commercial houses, whose partners and agents resided in America, and who as universally adhered to the side of Great Britain, as the real American merchants did to that of their country, will come to be considered hereafter.

Mr. King is ready to avow that the amount of these cash purchases, or the proportion which they bore to that of the whole annual exports, is a point of great uncertainty, and he cannot, therefore, be at all confident that the proportion did not considerably exceed that which he has specified. A given sum must be allowed; and he continues to believe that the proportion which has been mentioned is a moderate one.

Pursuing the subject of deductions and augmentations, it will simplify the discussion to go on with the consideration of the claims of augmentation in the order proposed by Mr. Anstey, instead of stopping to examine the grounds upon which he assumes the value of two entire years' exports as the standard of the debt at the breaking out of the war. This examination will follow, in course, after that of the several heads of augmentation.

Augmentations claimed by Mr. Anstey.

First head. Mr. King altogether approves the separation, for the purpose of this discussion, of "the commercial claims" from the claims of the loyalists. By adhering to this distinction, the remarks on both sides will be more easily understood.

No person is better acquainted with the character and circumstances of the American loyalists than Mr. Anstey; no one has had fuller means of estimating the real merits of their various pretensions: and, extravagant as the sum is which is stated in Mr. Anstey's last note to have been claimed by the loyalists on account of debts due to them in America, Mr. Anstey's experience in analogous cases must suggest to him the immense deduction to which this claim also is liable. The best founded and most meritorious claim of the loyalists was for the loss of real estates. Mr. Anstey is well acquainted how extensively these estates were found to be incumbered: a circumstance inconsistent with the pretension that these persons were creditors to any considerable amount, since those who have money due to them collect it, instead of becoming themselves debtors by borrowing. The loyalists were, in general, persons holding and expecting, or intimately connected with, and influenced by those who held and expected, offices under the crown, and were not generally persons of much property. The liquidation of their claims exhibited to the British Government appears to have had a salutary influence in moderating their recent demands on account of American debts: for, instead of a sum exceeding two millions sterling, which Mr. Anstey states to have been the former claim presented to the British Government, their whole claim lately exhibited at Philadelphia does not much exceed one-sixth part of that sum; and if it be divided into two classes, the first including the claims strictly commercial, and, as such, falling under the third and fourth heads of augmentation; and the second the claims of persons not concerned in trade; it will be found that the amount of the latter claim bears but a very small proportion to the former, and, when liquidated according to its merits, would not form a serious obstacle, on either side, to a satisfactory conclusion of the business under consideration.

Second head. As nothing is claimed under this head, it is unnecessary to add any further observations respecting the course of the trade to which it relates.

Third and fourth heads. These two heads reduce themselves to the consideration of the allowance which may be claimed on account of that portion of the trade to America which was carried on within the country by partners and agents of British houses. In the general views which serve as grounds of estimate and computation in the course of this discussion, Mr. King has thought it advisable to omit every unimportant branch into which the subject might divide itself; and, from this consideration, the item now under examination was passed over.

So far as the trade was carried on by partners and agents of British houses, who went to America for this purpose, something may be allowed on the score of mercantile profit. This course prevailed, in a greater or less extent, in the trade between Scotland, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia; but what proportion of the whole trade between these colonies and Great Britain was of this description, and how much of it was upon the footing of the trade with the other colonies, is a point upon which Mr. King confesses his want of exact information. If Mr. Anstey have any means by which he is able to ascertain this proportion, and the point shall be thought of sufficient importance, in reference to the nature and object of this discussion, to merit a further examination, Mr. King will give to Mr. Anstey's observations all the consideration which their merits may appear to demand. He cannot, however, avoid remarking to Mr. Anstey, that no inference, with regard to the freight upon a cargo of English manufactures, can be deduced from the ad valorem freight received upon a cargo of provisions and lumber carried from America to the West Indies: the former are valuable articles comprised within a small compass; the latter are cheap ones, and of great bulk. Forty, or even fifty per cent., upon the first cost of the latter might not be equal to one and a half or two per cent. upon the value of the former.

According to the import of the foregoing observations, the official value of the exports should be increased by one-third of the difference between it and the convoy value, in order to ascertain the true value of the exports in any of the three years preceding the American war. If the value of the annual exports be assumed as the standard of the debt annually contracted, the estimate, as has before been observed, will require further correction: it must, for this purpose, be diminished a sum equal to the amount of the goods purchased by the American merchants for cash, and increased a sum equal to a fair profit upon such proportion of the goods as were carried to America at the risk, and sold there on the account, of the British merchants. Provided the question turned upon the exports of a single year, an estimate corrected according to the foregoing rules would, with a suitable addition on account of the loyalists' claims, furnish the standard which is sought for; or, in other words, would disclose the amount of the American debt at the commencement of the year 1775.

In Mr. King's note of the 23d of November, the chief reasons are explained upon which he founds the opinion that the debt due to British creditors, at the breaking out of the American war, did not exceed the value of one year's export. These reasons are concisely as follows: the credit given was for the term of one year, and never exceeded it. So far as respects the southern colonies, the annual crops were the fund looked to for re-imbursement, and these were effectually secured to the creditors by the operation of the navigation act. It is not pretended that the payments were, in every instance, made within the limits of the credit. From various causes, individuals might occasionally fail in punctuality; their numbers might be greater in some quarters than in others; and their failures more considerable at one time than at another: and hence a fluctuating arrearage of debt, concerning whose amount opinions might vary, may be supposed to have generally existed. This arrearage Mr. King disposed of against the proportion of the annual exports purchased by the American merchants with cash. The position relied upon is, that in such a trade annual credits supposed annual payments, subject only to such particular exceptions as the condition and circumstances of the creditors made unavoidable.

Without contesting the facts, from which the foregoing deduction is drawn, Mr. Anstey meets it by the observation, that, though it was universally the custom of the British merchant, in no instance, to allow of more than one year's credit, it was nevertheless the practice of the American trade to take it for three years, and, in some instances, even for a much longer term: and from hence he concludes, that the debt, at the breaking out of the war, must have been equal to upwards of six millions sterling, or the joint amount of two entire years' exports.

The importance and influence of this conclusion, in reference to the end aimed at in this discussion, certainly requires the disclosure of such evidence in its support, as would dispose an impartial mind to acquiesce in its justness: the inference, it will be remarked, applies to the whole body of traders, and not to a part of them. If individuals, and even a considerable number of them, from whatever causes it might happen, failed in punctual remittances, this circumstance would not warrant a general conclusion applying such failure to the whole body of debtors. Neither can such conclusion be deduced from the custom of bringing forward and annually incorporating the arrearage, in particular cases, of the debt of a former year, with the new debt annually contracted. In further support of this conclusion, Mr. Anstey supposes that the natural consequence of hostilities was an immediate refusal on one side of new credits, and on the other of further payments on account of old debts. Though the breaking out of the war could not have any effect upon past transactions, and afford no assistance in determining the question whether the debt then, or at any former time, equalled, exceeded, or fell short of the amount of one or two years' exports, it nevertheless produced and was followed by a most important alteration of the debt, whatever may have been its amount, which existed at that period; for the commencement of hostilities, which operated almost entirely to put an end to fresh credits, inspired the creditors and their agents with uncommon activity in collecting and securing their outstanding debts. Hostilities began in April, 1775; but the commercial intercourse between the two countries was not suspended before December following, when the act of Parliament for that purpose was passed, and the political union was not dissolved until the succeeding year. It was for the purpose of elucidating the transactions of this period that Mr. King requested Mr. Anstey to furnish him, from the office of the Inspector General, with an account of the imports from the colonies forming the United States for ten years preceding the fifth of January, 1776. By this account, it appears that the official value of the imports from the said colonies, in the year 1775, amounted to two millions four hundred and fifty-seven thousand pounds, and exceeded, by more than half a million sterling, the imports of any former year; while the official value of the exports of that year from Great Britain to the same colonies was only two hundred and fourteen thousand pounds, or about a tenth part of the usual amount. Not only the quantity of the staple articles of indigo, rice, and tobacco was greater than in former years, but the quantity of miscellaneous articles, ordinarily of comparatively small amount, was in this year double what it had been in any former year: a circumstance not otherwise worthy of notice than as it shows the diligence and success of the creditors during the year 1775 in the collection of their debts. If, to the remittances which were made in the productions of the southern colonies, be joined those which the same causes, without doubt, extracted from the northern colonies, through the channels in which their payments were usually made, it may be safely concluded that the payments of the year 1775, in which little or no new debt was contracted, not only exceeded those of any former year, but went far towards liquidating the debt due to British creditors. This fact, at the same time so important and so well established, and which has been excluded from all consideration in the forming of Mr Anstey's estimate of the debt, will, without doubt, be allowed its full and proper influence in a revision of the subject.

Although the preceding analysis might suffice to justify Mr. King's dissent from Mr. Anstey's estimate, as well as to support his own, he is solicitous to place the subject in such other points of view as appear to him likely to satisfy Mr. Anstey that he has not demanded his assent to an opinion incapable of defence, or founded upon a partial consideration of the subject. It is on this account that he has thought it advisable to endeavor to render the discussion more simple, by stripping it of every unimportant circumstance, and confining it to as narrow a field as possible. The Inspector General's accounts of exports and imports for ten years preceding the year 1776, together with the claims of the British creditors, as lately exhibited at Philadelphia, enable him to effect this purpose. The total amount of these claims, including interest, from the date of the several debts up to the first day of January, 1798, is somewhat above four millions sterling; of which sum * two hundred and eighteen thousand only are claimed of the inhabitants of the States north of Maryland: the residue, three millions eight hundred thousand pounds, are claimed of the inhabitants of Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. The proportion of the former is so inconsiderable that, for the purpose of this illustration, it may proceed upon the idea that the whole four millions is claimed of the inhabitants of the five southern States. Adhering to the basis upon which the negotiation commenced, that of seeking for the amount of the debt, by ascertaining the value of the exports, the comparison of the exports and imports to and from the five southern States, for the three years preceding the suspension of their commercial intercourse with Great Britain, cannot fail to cast new light upon the question under consideration.

* Of this sum nearly £200,000 are claimed by loyalists, leaving a commercial claim of only £20,000.

It may be proper to remark that these are the States which produce the staple articles of American exports, and it is in this quarter of which it may be emphatically said, that the annual credits were given in the expectation of payment in the annual crops, which, (with the exception of a portion of the rice sold for the benefit, and usually on account of the British creditors in the south of Europe,) according to the provisions of the navigation law, were sent to Great Britain, and received by the creditors, who alone were the correspondents of the American merchants and planters.

The Inspector General's accounts are as follows:

Extract of the Inspector General's account of the exports from Great Britain to Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and of the imports from the same into Great Britain in the following years, viz:

Exports from Great Britain to Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.			Imports into Great Britain from Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.
Year.	Official value established in 1697.	Real value in 1800.	Year.	Official value established in 1697.	Real value in 1800.
1773,	1,037,691	1,559,997	1773,	1,639,905	1,843,781
1774,	1,161,556	1,820,469	1774,	1,570,029	1,816,372
1775,	126,963	205,721	1775,	1,955,947	2,233,873
	£2,326,210	£3,586,187		£5,165,881	£5,894,026

These accounts, so far as regards the real value of the small and miscellaneous articles of imports, are deficient; the Inspector General not having the means of correcting their official value, which is here taken in lieu of the real value. The difference is altogether unimportant, and, whatever it may be, operates against the imports in the above comparison.

If the official value of the exports and imports be corrected by a common rule, and, in order to ascertain their true value in the years referred to, the official value be increased by the addition of one-third of the excess of the real above the official value, the result appears to be, that the aggregate value of the exports from Great Britain to Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, in the years 1773, 1774, and 1775, amounted to two millions seven hundred and fifty-nine thousand five hundred and thirty-six pounds, and the aggregate value of the imports from the same into Great Britain, during the same years, to five millions four hundred and eight thousand five hundred and ninety-six pounds; yielding a balance, in favor of these five colonies, of two millions, six hundred and forty-nine thousand and sixty pounds.

Deducting from this balance a full allowance on account of freight, which may have been earned by the ships of the northern colonies, as well as a further sum upon the supposition that a portion of the productions may have been purchased and imported on account of the ship owners, still there will remain a balance in favor of these five colonies, so considerable, and that too at the moment when the commercial intercourse between them and Great Britain ceased, as to produce much hesitation in the admission of the proffered claim of the British creditors; a claim which, in this view of the trade, seems more likely to be the drossy mass of old and hopeless balances, accumulated in the course of a diffusive retail trade, and swelled by the addition of interest through a series of years, than the sound aggregate of undisputed debts due from solvent debtors.

If it be recollected that the claim of the British creditors is essentially confined to the inhabitants of the five southern States, those of the other States having settled their debts, the above comparison of the exports and imports must not only affect the credit of the estimate which carries the debt due at the breaking out of the war to a sum equal to two years' exports, or upwards of six millions sterling; but will, moreover, inspire a rational doubt whether the value of a single year's exports did not exceed the amount of the debt at that period.

Recurring to the mode before proposed of ascertaining the debt from the amount of one year's exports, to the whole of the colonies composing the United States, and adopting for this purpose the Inspector General's accounts, it appears that,

The average real value of the whole exports of 1773 and 1774, according to the valuation of 1800, is	3,963,415
Their average official value, according to the valuation of 1697, - - - - - -	2,578,536
The excess of the former above the latter, - - - - - - - - -	£1,384,879

By adding one-third of this excess to the average official value of the exports of those years, (the reasons in support of which proportion have been given,) the result discloses the average value of the exports to the whole of the colonies forming the United States, in each of those years, thus:

Average official value, as above, - - - - - - - - - -	2,578,536
One-third of the difference between the real and official value, - - - - -	461,626
Result, or average value of the exports of the years 1773 and 1774, - - - - -	£3,040,162

If the different heads of deduction and augmentation, which have been suggested with the view of correcting the estimate of the annual exports, be each allowed its proper influence, or, what will be nearly the same, entirely laid out of the question, this sum of three millions and forty thousand one hundred and sixty-two pounds, will, according to the principle which has been adopted, represent the amount of the debt when the war broke off the annual intercourse between the two countries.

As the greater part of the year 1775, during which little or no new credits were given, was employed, with great success, in liquidating and collecting the debts before contracted it may safely be concluded that a considerable portion of the debt which could neither be collected nor secured, was due from persons insolvent at the commencement of the war; and, if to this portion be added the debts of those who became insolvent in the course of the war, whoever is acquainted with the nature and circumstances of the trade, the waste and destruction of the war, or the proportion of the debt recovered by the creditors at the return of peace; and that, too, in scenes where the whole property of the debtor was given up to the creditor, will be disposed to agree that not more than one-half the sum due at the beginning of the war could have been recovered by a complete cession of the debtor's goods at its conclusion.

The debts recovered since the war have been considerable throughout the United States, though the proportion has been much greater in some of them than in others; in those where the creditors have had the least success, they have not labored in vain. In the States to the northward of Maryland, which received nearly three-fifths of the exports to the whole of the States, the debts have been so generally settled, that only a few small and disputed commercial claims remain. An inference has been drawn from those facts, that at least one-half of the debt due from persons solvent at the close of the war has been paid. By these deductions, the principal would be reduced to seven hundred and sixty thousand and forty pounds; and, if this sum be doubled on account of interest, the debt now due, will amount to one million five hundred and twenty thousand and eighty pounds, instead of one million five hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-nine; at which Mr. King, in his note of the 23d of November, had estimated it.

The United States being liable to pay only such proportion of the outstanding debt as, had there been no legal impediments, might have been recovered of the debtors, at the close of the war, and which cannot now be recovered, it remains to ascertain this proportion.

Mr. King stated it at a third, founding his opinion that at least two-thirds might still be recovered of the debtors, upon the incontestable facts that the courts of justice are now completely open, and the ability of the debtors to pay their debts in general greater than it was at the close of the war. Much detail might be given in proof of the latter point; the whole of which is, however, comprised in the simple comparison of the condition of the industrious inhabitants of any country, which had been the theatre of a seven years' war, at the conclusion of such war, with their condition after the enjoyment of double that number of years of peace.

In respect to the tribunals, it is alleged that the State courts are not as impartial as the federal courts; that the prejudices ascribed to the juries are under less control in the former than in the latter; and as the federal courts have no jurisdiction under five hundred dollars, or one hundred and twelve pounds ten shillings sterling, that a considerable portion of the claims cannot receive a decision in the most impartial tribunals.

Without entering into an examination of these opinions, in respect to the relative impartiality of the American tribunals, it should be recollected that the State tribunals, and their rules of proceeding, are the same now as they were when the credits were given. In the colonial system, the provincial courts had original jurisdiction in all cases, and final jurisdiction in cases under three hundred pounds sterling; in causes above that amount only an appeal might be prosecuted before the King in council, a tribunal having no original jurisdiction. Instead of this remedy, the federal courts have a revisionary jurisdiction in every case, without reference to its amount, in which the demand is affected by a national treaty, or a law of the United States, and original jurisdiction in all cases under five hundred dollars, or one hundred and twelve pounds ten shillings sterling. As the claims of all British creditors fall within these predicaments, the objection to the State courts, were it well founded, is done away by the recourse which may be had to the courts of the United States.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, January 30, 1801.

Mr. King has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Anstey's note of the 23d instant; and it is with equal regret and disappointment that he perceives that the sum which Mr. Anstey has mentioned as, in his opinion, proper to be required of the American Government, in lieu of what it might be liable to pay under the sixth article of the treaty of amity and commerce, so much exceeds what, upon any view which Mr. King has taken of the subject, can be thought a just equivalent for the relinquishment of that article, and is so far above the demand which he had any reason to believe would have been made, even for the relinquishment of the entire claim of the British creditors, that he will not conceal from Mr. Anstey his concern lest the estimates and opinions, which he seems to have formed, should ultimately disappoint an agreement, which the true interest of all parties so manifestly requires.

Mr. King having, in his note of yesterday, explained himself very fully in respect to the merits and amount of the debt, as well as with regard to the sum which, in his opinion, would be a full equivalent to what, upon a just interpretation of the sixth article of the treaty of amity and commerce, might be awarded against the American Government, will not, at present, trouble Mr. Anstey with any further observations upon either of these subjects.

GLOUCESTER PLACE, PORTMAN SQUARE, January 31, 1801.

Mr. Anstey has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. King's communication of the 29th, in answer to his of the 17th and 21st instant.

Mr. Anstey begs leave to request that Mr. King will have the goodness to inform him whether he is to understand that his answer comprehends a statement of all the grounds upon which the deductions proposed by him, in his note of the 23d of November last, rest for their support?

And whether Mr. King has any particular data, by which he can calculate upon the deduction of a moiety from the amount of the American debt on the score of insolvency during the war, in preference to any other given proportion? And also, whether Mr. King has any certain data to justify the deduction of a moiety of the remaining moiety, on the score of actual recovery since the peace?

And, in particular, whether he can adduce any specific facts of a recent date, to demonstrate the existence of new facilities afforded to British creditors in the recovery of their debts in the different States, which shall have removed the grounds and causes of complaint alleged in the sixth article of the treaty of amity, so as to justify a further deduction from the amount of the debt, in the proportion of two-thirds of what remains upon the balance of the other deductions, in consideration of the certain prospect of a speedy and eventual recovery to that extent.

Mr. Anstey has the honor of Mr. King's answer to his proposal of the 23d instant, and acknowledges the receipt of the minutes of the conference of the same date: he will be obliged to Mr. King for a sight of the three documents certified from the office of the Inspector General.

No. 25.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, February 2, 1801.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Mr. Anstey, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his note of the 31st ultimo.

The reasons assigned in Mr. King's note of the 29th ultimo, in justification of the proposed deductions from the estimated amount of the debt due to British creditors at the beginning of the American war, might have been given in greater detail than Mr. King judged it necessary to go into; inasmuch as it was presumed that such details would naturally suggest themselves upon the consideration of the general reasons which were given, and which, it was expected, would be understood, not only to comprise, but to supersede the enumeration of, a variety of particular ones.

Mr. King's note includes the objections to which Mr. Anstey's estimate appeared to him liable, together with such further arguments in support of an estimate derived from the materials received from the Inspector General's office, as he was in hopes would engage Mr. Anstey's approbation. In this stage of the discussion, it is quite in course that Mr. King should wait for Mr. Anstey's reply to his note of the 29th ultimo, instead of repeating the answers which he flatters himself will be satisfactorily found in that note to the interrogatories which Mr. Anstey has deemed it suitable to propound in his note of the 31st. Mr. King, therefore, does not think it necessary, at present, to trouble Mr. Anstey with any further observations upon the several points discussed in his note to Mr. Anstey of the 29th ultimo.

Mr. King has the honor to send, enclosed, the accounts received from the office of the Inspector General, which Mr. Anstey is desirous of seeing.

GLOUCESTER PLACE, March 18, 1801.

Mr. J. Anstey presents his compliments to Mr. King; has the honor to acquaint him that he has seen Lord Hawkesbury (for the first time) this morning, and takes the first opportunity of troubling him with the enclosed answer to his note of the 29th January. The answer is dated the 14th February, the day on which it was intended to have presented Mr. King with it; but owing to the chances or changes, which have since happened, Mr. Anstey did not think himself authorized to present it till he had seen His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

No. 27. (8.)

GLOUCESTER PLACE, PORTMAN SQUARE, February 14, 1814.

Mr. Anstey, in presenting a reply to the paper he last had the honor to receive from Mr. King, must be permitted to add one observation with reference to Mr. King's note, declining his proposal of the 23d ultimo.

Mr. Anstey, by that proposal, accompanied by all the allowances and concessions with which it was submitted, was in hopes to have marked the character of the present negotiation with peculiar candor and liberality on the part of His Majesty's Government: he still flatters himself the discussion may lead to some practicable result; but, in any event, he feels it incumbent upon him to answer what has been objected to, so far at least as to prevent misapprehension, and to show still further, by the following remarks, that the estimate and opinions he has formed have not been inconsiderately surmised, and are not deficient in that sort of proof which must be mutually regarded as fully adequate to their support.

In order to reduce the estimate of the value of British exports in the year 1774, below a moiety of the excess between the convoy price of the same articles at this day, and the standard valuation established in the year 1697, Mr. King supposes two-thirds of the increase, in the price of the whole century, to have accrued in the last thirty years; but it appearing to Mr. Anstey an incorrectness in the mode of stating the argument, to draw an inference from the supposed circumstance of the price of British exports being greater for the last thirty years, (in the proportion contended for,) in order to found a conclusion that, in the year 1774, being a part of those thirty years, the price of the same articles was in reality less. Mr. Anstey, in order to give effect to Mr. King's hypothesis, proposed to withdraw the first five years (forming a part of the thirty, ending with the year 1775,) into the opposite scale, which will justify the addition of a considerable increase in the estimate of the price, above the third part of the excess, as proposed to be adopted by Mr. King; and therefrom, by way of argument, Mr. Anstey stated a process of calculation, which forms a coincidence of result in numbers favorable, as he conceives, to the establishment of the moiety; to which Mr. King imputes an error of a nature somewhat similar to that which he has taken the liberty of imputing to Mr. King's statement; the correction of it, as suggested by Mr. King, will of course disturb the argument drawn from such a coincidence of result in numbers, but will not affect the accuracy of the general conclusion on this head. It shows, indeed, that the argument in question cannot be mathematically proved; but it is submitted that enough is shown, upon the corrected statement, to prove that, even admitting Mr. King's conjecture to be fact, and stating the hypothesis in the only way in which it can be framed, in order to bear on the point, it will uphold the addition of a considerable increase to the third proportion, so as abundantly to justify the general conclusions in favor of the moiety. But, divested of numerical problems, what is the true state of the argument? It stands thus: for the third proportion assumed by Mr. King, in preference to the moiety, no fact, but a conjecture, is adopted, that the advance in the price of the articles for the last thirty years is in the proportion of two-thirds more than in the seventy years preceding. It will be seen that the same might as well have been said of twenty or twenty-five years, or any other conjectural term of years. In support of this conjecture, the following reasons are assigned by Mr. King, which, with submission, if conceded, will have no weight in a comparison, as between a moiety and a third.

1st. "The extraordinary depreciation in the value of money, owing to the increase of specie or its representative."

2d. "The increased demand for British manufactures, arising from the derangement, during the present war, of the manufactures on the continent."

The first reason was anticipated by Mr. Anstey, as a ground for conceding the moiety; and, according to the weight and credit due to the fact, may be argued so as to coincide with any given proportion; but, independent of the fact, which is out of sight, can decide nothing upon a comparison between a third proportion and a moiety.

Neither will the second reason have much weight: for if the unexpected demand for articles of British manufacture, arising from a derangement of the manufactures on the continent, during the present war of eight years, would enhance the price, it must be allowed that the glut of the same articles in the market during the war in America, for the like period of eight years, would lessen the value of the same articles in the like proportion: from whence it will follow, as of course, that the supposed increase of price could not attach till the return of peace, in the year 1783, and that Mr. King's hypothesis in favor of the third proportion is confined to seventeen years; or, in effect, to this simple proposition, that the increase of the price of articles of British export has been greater within the last seventeen years than the accumulated increase of the eighty-three years preceding.

For the moiety, as proposed by Mr. Anstey, the argument stands thus: upon the fair and liberal principle of an equal division of the excess, in a case of much uncertainty, a fact (not an hypothesis) is stated, "that it is not universally true that all articles of British export are, without exception, dearer than they were in the year 1773 or 1774; but, on the contrary, some are "cheaper." Those of cotton manufacture have been specified, some of which are dearer, it is true, but in the proportion of twenty-five per cent. or one-fourth instead of above sixty-six pounds, six-shillings and eight pence, or two thirds, as supposed. And some articles of wrought cotton, so far from being dearer at this time, are actually in a very considerable degree cheaper than they were before the American war.

Mr. King states that Mr. Anstey has manifestly misapprehended the whole scope of his observations in respect to the goods, annually purchased with cash by the American merchants; and adds, "that Mr. Anstey supposes all the American merchants took the side of Great Britain." Mr. Anstey requests the favor of Mr. King to recur to his observations upon this head: he is confident that, upon a revision of the passage alluded to, Mr. King, with his usual candor, will allow that Mr. Anstey has by no means misapprehended his meaning. Mr. Anstey's observations will be found distinctly applicable to the ready money purchasers, and not to the native American merchants in general; and that he does by no means suppose all the American merchants took the side of Great Britain. On the contrary, Mr. Anstey expressly, by way of answer to Mr. King's claim of deduction, on account of cash payments, says, "If the ready money payments, by this distinct class of traders, amounted to one-fifth, (as Mr. King assumes,) that circumstance of itself, (for the reasons there assigned,) instead of a deduction will justify an augmentation of the estimate in respect of the freight, insurance, and mercantile profit upon a fifth part of the exports," viz. the fifth part supposed to have been purchased by the dealers for cash.

Mr. King allows that some of the American merchants did take the side of Great Britain. Mr. Anstey supposes only that they were most likely to be of that class who were creditors to their countrymen, rather than debtors to Great Britain.

Upon this head, the argument stands thus: Mr. King claims a deduction of the debt, equal to one-fifth of the exports, in respect of ready money payments for British exports by American merchants, and contends, "that all the American merchants were their own freighters." If so, and these merchants become loyalists, (as it has been shown it was their interest to be,) Mr. Anstey contends, (as stated in his paper No. 4,) that they became creditors on the side of Great Britain, upon a ground. as he expresses it, "distinct from that of the London merchants; for their debtors were indebted to them, not only the whole of the invoice price of the articles, but what will constitute a considerable debt of itself, a great addition of mercantile profit; in which, of course, would be included the expense of freight and insurance, &c;" and this inference must be conceded by Mr. King, if the fact be true, and it is in part acknowledged by Mr. King, for he says, "the native merchants who took the side of Great Britain were really few and unimportant." No augmentation, however, will be contended for on this ground; but no deduction Mr. Anstey conceives, equal to one-fifth of the exports, can in reason be allowed in consideration of ready money purchasers.

Upon the several heads of augmentation, Mr. Anstey has little to remark in addition to his former observations.

Upon the first head, respecting the loyalists who were not traders, and their debt as it stood at the commencement of the war, Mr. Anstey has assigned their original claim at two millions three hundred and fifty-four thousand one hundred and thirty-five pounds twelve shillings and four pence, which, by analogy to the liquidation of their claims on the score of confiscated property, he estimates at one-third of the claim at the breaking out of the war. Mr. Anstey conceives that it would be difficult to find more certain data to go upon, or a more candid statement. The analogy relied on is liable to less exception, because the claims for property, to which the claim for debt was attached, were liquidated by the commissioners, under the acts for granting compensation to the loyalists, with reference to the pretensions of the claimants on the score of loyalty and attachment to His Majesty's Government: whereas, the fourth article of the treaty of peace guaranties the payment of debts, without requiring of the claimants to entitle themselves as loyalists in the sense of the acts of Parliament, upon the sound construction of which many claims for supposed losses of property were shipwrecked, upon various accounts. To take the debts, therefore, attached to these claims for property at a third, for the purpose of perfecting the estimate of the American debt, seems a very moderate computation, when considered subject, as the whole is, to the principles of deductions proposed by Mr. King. The amount of the loyalist debt claimed before the commissioners at Philadelphia, sixteen years afterwards, being, as Mr. King states, but a sixth part of that sum, does not affect the calculation of the debt as it stood at the commencement of the war; and, as it remains to be considered, subject to the deductions above alluded to, one-third will be seven hundred and eighty-four thousand seven hundred and thirty-one pounds. Admitting, therefore, Mr. King's deductions on the score of supposed insolvency during the war, as also on the score of actual recovery since the peace, to operate on the scale he contends for, and the balance doubled on the score of interest, as conceded by him, the amount will then be three hundred and ninety-two thousand three hundred and sixty-five pounds. Mr. King states the sum now claimed by the loyalists at two hundred and twenty thousand pounds. Their debt, therefore, at the commencement of the war, in order to be calculated with reference to the above deductions, shall be taken only at five hundred thousand pounds.

With respect to the third head of augmentation on the score of freight and insurance, mercantile profit, &c., Mr. King observes, "that in the general views which serve as grounds of estimate and computation in the course of this discussion, he thought it advisable to omit every unimportant branch into which the subject might divide itself;" and, from this consideration, the items now under examination were passed over.

Mr. King, in the first paper Mr. Anstey had the honor to receive from him, resisted the idea of the possibility of any thing being due and chargeable on the score of freight, sea risk, mercantile profit, &c., and assigned his reasons.

Mr. Anstey has replied to those reasons; and Mr. King very candidly allows that, so far as the trade was carried on by partners and agents for British houses, something may be allowed on the score of mercantile profit. It remains for Mr. Anstey to prove that the allowance is not unimportant to be demanded, and to show, as nearly as he can, what it really is. Mr. Anstey has made an extensive inquiry upon the subject, and has authority to state, that at least one-third, and more probably a greater proportion, of the debt claimed as due in the year 1791, had been contracted in a course of trade, distinct from the London trade, on commission, and which, being carried on at the risk and expense of the British merchant, justified an augmentation in the price of the articles exported in the proportions ad valorem, as follows:

Freight, ad valorem, - - - - - - -	£2 10*s.*
Shipping charges, including porterage, wharfage, and lighterage, - - -	1
Insurance, varying from £2 2*s.* to £2 10*s.*, in winter, say - - -	2 2
Mercantile profit, the difference between currency* and sterling, two-fifths, or -	40 per cent.

Making, upon the whole, above 45 per cent. addition to the prices of the articles exported in this branch of the trade.†

Mr. King observes that Mr. Anstey has not contested the facts from which he has drawn the following deduction, namely, "that the annual credits suppose annual payments, subject only to such particular exceptions as the condition and circumstances of the creditors made unavoidable;" but meets it by the observation that, though it was the custom of the British merchants, in no instance, to allow of more than one year's credit, it was, nevertheless, the practice of the American trader to take it for three years, and, in many instances, for a much longer term. Mr. King will pardon Mr. Anstey for observing that he is at a loss to discover any fact to be contested on this ground. Mr. King's supposition as to the probability of the annual payments and credits being co-extensive, (with an exception only of some unavoidable instances,) is indeed opposed by a fact bearing directly on the point, viz: "that it was the custom" (as Mr. Anstey asserts,) "with the London merchants," (a custom which he since understands to have extended to the whole trade, without exception,) "to strike balances on their accounts once in every year, and to carry them forward, in account current, to the succeeding year, from the date of those balances, with interest." And, with respect to Mr. Anstey's assertion, that it was the practice of the American trader to take credit for three years, and, in some instances, for a much longer term, he has only to request to be correctly understood, as by no means speaking of a fact applicable to the whole body of American merchants. It will be seen, by a revision of the paper alluded to, that he does not state an abstract proposition in general terms, but with reference to what he had before, in the sentence immediately preceding, admitted, with respect to the term of credit usually given, viz: "that, although it did not exceed one year, it was taken" not unfrequently, (which words have been accidentally omitted,) "for three years, and, in some instances, for a much longer term:" the whole passage must be viewed as expectant on what follows and precedes it, and the object to which it is pointed, viz: a credit equal to the value of two years' exports; the first year of which Mr. Anstey has assumed to be made up partly of the unsatisfied credits of that year, and partly of the arrearages of former years; to the establishment of which fact the whole of the argument is confined: for it should be remembered that, in a former paper, Mr. Anstey has explicitly stated that, had he conceived the custom of the trade to have allowed of three years' credit in the terms of the invoice, he should have thought it incumbent on him to have taken ground upon that fact in the estimate.

It is not, however, material for him to prove that the plain context of the whole passage, as it stands, will bear out his meaning thus explained; as Mr. King, in conversation, since he had the honor of presenting this note, has very candidly admitted that the several sentences, collectively taken, and considered as dependent upon each other, justify the construction insisted on; and that, accordingly, all his objections to the universality of the position are thereby effectually obviated.

Mr. Anstey, in thus stating the facts on which he relies, can very safely declare that he is considerably within the scope of the information he has derived upon this point.

Mr. Anstey understands the sum of Mr. King's objections to his position "that the war, by breaking in upon the credits, fixed the debt and suspended the payments from that period," to be confined to a distinction as to the time when the war may be said to have commenced: that, although hostilities began in April, 1775, the commercial intercourse was not suspended till the December following; and, therefore, Mr. King takes a new view of the subject, and the tenor of his reasoning is to show that Mr. Anstey's estimate should have been formed with reference to the exports and imports of the first year of the war, and not to the exports only of the years preceding the commencement of hostilities. Upon which, Mr. Anstey has only to observe, that he assumed the date of the custom-house year, ending the 5th of January, 1775, in order to apply (in the only way in which it could be applied) the principle of calculation upon the exports only, for a given number of years prior to the war—a principle proposed by Mr. King, and adopted by Mr. Anstey, in conformity to his proposal, in order to which it was necessary to date the calculation from some point of time. That period presented itself as most eligible which stood clearest of the war, and, at the same time, the nearest to it: the non-importation agreements had passed in 1774, and had the effect of law in the colonies early in the year 1775, and, being rigidly exacted, must have had an influence on the exports of the following spring. A middle time, therefore, namely, the time of making up the annual accounts of the customs, on the 5th of January, 1775, offered itself, with peculiar propriety, with a view to the estimate of the exports for a given number of years prior to the war: for the effect of the war on the export trade was complete in the spring of that year, which was the time of the first commencement of hostilities. But Mr. Anstey agrees that it would have applied closer to the principle now, for the first time, adopted by Mr. King, of balancing the exports against the imports of the first year of the war, to have dated the reckoning retrospectively from December, 1775, rather than from the 5th of January preceding; but, in either view of the subject, it is plain that the natural consequences of the non-importation agreements, and of the commencement of hostilities in the April following, must have been an immediate default of new credits; and that the influence of the war, at the time when the interruption of the commercial intercourse became reciprocal and complete, in the December following, had the effect of suspending the payments from that period. The amount of the exports, in the mean time, was too inconsiderable in the comparison to make any distinction as to time necessary: for, from whatever time it is agreed to date the commencement of the war retrospectively, for the purpose of forming this estimate, (and it has been seen why the period assumed has been preferred,) it must proceed upon the principle that the payments were stopped from that moment; and, if, after adopting the principle of calculating upon the exports of the first year of the war is brought forward, with reference to the time when they were only one-tenth of the usual amount, and these are to be considered in contrast with the imports of that year, which exceeded, by half a million, those of any former year; different premises, and a total different process of calculation, must be assumed, in order to make it appear that there was, in fact, any debt due from the colonies at the commencement of the war. The conclusion, indeed, if any can be drawn from such a statement, might almost seem to warrant a belief that the claimants had mistaken their character, and, instead of being creditors, they were, in fact, bona fide debtors, to their old friends and customers.

*Dollars valued at 4*s.* 6*d.*, sterling; currency, 7*s.* 6*d.*

† Mr Anstey understands the practice of merchants using this branch of the trade to have been to charge in this proportion, and with reference to this distinction, in their retail dealings. This proportion, however, is not insisted on as an augmentation to this estimate of the American debt, but is stated in this place to show that the mercantile profit did not form an immaterial and unimportant part of the debt.

But the general question of the American debt comes now to be considered (as proposed by Mr. King) upon new ground; and with reference to the general state of the trade, under the first impression, and during the immediate influence of the war, Mr. King thinks it may be safely concluded that the "payments (which he infers from the remittances in produce) of the year 1775, in which little or no new debt was contracted, not only exceeded those of any former year, but went far towards liquidating the debt due to British creditors." The excess of the imports of that year is demonstrated. But it does not, therefore, follow that these remittances in the staple produce of the colonies were exclusively from American debtors to British creditors. Doubtless, a considerable proportion of the importations of that year went in payment of British debts. This is acknowledged. But remittances under the influence of the war may be otherwise accounted for, by analogy to the effect of the same causes, in other countries, and in all ages, operating upon the apprehensions, and the interests, and local condition of men in general, as well merchants as others, who, in the prospect of an impending storm, and under the terror of it, must ever be anxious to remit and realize their property. The non-importation laws and agreements were in full force, and rigidly exacted; similar restrictions, with respect to the export trade, were then expected throughout America; prohibitory bills, cutting off all commercial connexions with the colonies threatened in Parliament; hostilities not only commenced, but advanced. From such a combination of causes, a serious and solid ground of belief may be reasonably entertained that the influence of the war must have swelled the list of imports of the year 1775 beyond all former example.

It must, therefore, be allowed not to have been absolutely necessary that every American should have been a debtor, in order to have made it his interest to remit the staple produce of the country to Great Britain.

Without meaning to detract from the zeal and alacrity of creditors and their agents, who were busied in collecting their outstanding debts, numbers not concerned in the regular trade of the country were solicitous, in that early stage of the contest, to improve the opportunity of exporting the produce of their estates while it lasted. They shipped their cargoes, and drew bills on the credit of the invoices. Bills also to a greater amount, in the first year of the war, were honored and placed to the debit of the American traders in account current than in any former year. The hopes still entertained by the British merchants, that their petitions, then pending in Parliament, or in contemplation, would prove unsuccessful; their anxiety to retain and fix their customers by acts of courtesy and forbearance, and, by obliging them to encourage the continuance of their efforts, to make further remittances; all contributed to the same effect. The amount of bills thus honored and paid, during that year, is supposed to have exceeded five hundred thousand pounds. Mr. Anstey has authority to state that sum; and it is somewhat singular that it should equal the excess of the imports of that year.

Mr. King proposes another mode of estimating the debt, namely, by reference to the claims presented under the commission at Philadelphia in 1798, and a comparison between the exports and imports of the five southern States during the first year of the American war, and the two years immediately preceding, upon the principle that the debt claimed under the commission, as due at this time, is confined to those States, with the exception only of the sum of two hundred and eighteen thousand pounds due from the inhabitants of the eight States north of Maryland; the rest of the debt claimed from those States having been paid off since the conclusion of the American war; and that the document from the customs, with the application of the rule of measuring the true value (as proposed by Mr. King,) will demonstrate a balance in favor of the five southern States, equal to two millions six hundred and forty-nine thousand and sixty pounds: from which fact Mr. King concludes, in substance, as follows:

First. "That the preferred claim of the British creditors is more likely to be a drossy mass of old and hopeless balances, swelled up by the addition of interest, than the sound aggregate of undisputed debts due from solvent debtors:" and,

Secondly. "That so far from the debt due at the breaking out of the war being equal to two years' exports, or upwards of six millions, a rational doubt may be entertained whether the value of a single year's exports did not exceed the amount of the debt at that period."

The first of these conclusions it is more the province of commissioners to determine on the merits of the respective claims. The last merits a more particular examination.

It has been seen in what manner the extraordinary remittances in produce from the thirteen provinces, during the first year of the war, may be accounted for, without the necessary conclusion that the whole went in payment of British debts; and it will follow, from the partial view of the subject, now confined to the consideration of the imports, from five only out of the thirteen colonies, that nothing can be certainly or safely concluded with reference to the amount of the whole debt actually due at the present or any former period. For the influence of the war upon the trade was general, and the zeal and alacrity ascribed to British creditors and their agents in collecting their debts was not confined to the five southern colonies, but must have prevailed with equal success in the colonies to the northward of Maryland; but it is conceived that, not only in the year 1775, but in the two preceding years, extraordinary remittances were made from other parts of the continent, through the channel of the southern colonies; and it must have been the practice at all times to have remitted more from those colonies than was actually applied in payment of their own peculiar debt.

It is a fact, appearing on the face of the document from which Mr. King's statement is extracted, that at no time, for the period of ten years prior to the war, did the amount of exports from Great Britain equal the imports from those provinces; on the contrary, it appears that the imports into Great Britain yielded a balance in favor of the five southern colonies, as follows: for the nine years prior to the first year of the war, the sum of one million eight hundred and sixty-five thousand four hundred and seventy-three pounds; and, including the first year of the war, was three millions four hundred and ninety-four thousand four hundred and fifty-seven. By what means, therefore, can it be accounted for, consistently with the object for which this partial view of the debt is compared with the amount of the claims at Philadelphia, that, instead of a debt appearing to be due to the extent of four millions, as claimed against the inhabitants of the five southern States, a balance appears against the trade from the southern colonies, upon the face of this certificate, equal to three millions and a half—a balance against the creditor almost equal to their present demand against their debtors. Such is the fact: and it requires only to be stated, in order to render all observation and argument against such a partial view of the subject superfluous and unnecessary. From Mr. King's proposition, one or other of two conclusions is unavoidable; either that remittances were made through the five southern colonies, in satisfaction of British debts due from the other eight, or that such remittances at no time were specifically and exclusively appropriated in payment of their own debts contracted on the credit of the annual exports into those colonies from Great Britain.

On whose account, or in what manner, these remittances were made, or how applied, is not material to the point for which these observations are submitted; it is sufficient that enough is here demonstrated to prove, beyond a doubt, that the examen proposed is imperfect, and affords no certain criterion to be relied on; and, in fact, that from any partial consideration of the subject, no argument can be drawn as to the amount of the whole debt due from those colonies before the war, or as to the claim of the creditors under the commission at Philadelphia three and twenty years afterwards.

Mr. Anstey conceives that, if the imports are to be balanced with the exports, for any purpose of estimating the debt, it is a safer mode of proceeding, and liable to much less risk of error and uncertainty, to calculate them independent of the circumstances of the war, from all the colonies on the continent for nine or ten years successively, instead of confining the calculation to the five southern colonies for the first year of the war. The account will render, upon this equal mode of computation, a balance in favor of Great Britain, upon the credit given for the exports for nine years above, seven millions eight hundred and seventy-five thousand and four hundred and forty-one pounds; if for ten years, including the first year of the war, five millions six hundred and thirty-three thousand two hundred and eighty-nine pounds, upon the official value alone, which for this purpose is sufficient, as it will show the proportion, which is all that is necessary for the purpose of this illustration. But if taken at a medium of the excess between the convoy price and the official standard of 1797, as proposed by Mr. Anstey, or even at a third, as contended for by Mr. King, will swell the balance far beyond what is required to prove that the sum of four millions may still, for any thing that appears to the contrary from Mr. King's statement, be fairly and substantially due from the inhabitants of the five southern States.

To conclude.—Upon a review of the present state of the discussion, it will appear that the principle of calculating upon the exports only, as originally proposed by Mr. King, has been adopted by Mr. Anstey, and pursued.

The preference, as argued by Mr. Anstey, to be due to the criterion suggested by him, by which the amount of the debt was to be calculated upon that principle, has been conceded by Mr. King. An equal division of the excess, upon the balance between the convoy price of the exports and the official price, according to the custom-house standard of the year 1797, in preference to the proportion of a third only, has been proposed and supported upon fact, opposed to inference drawn from hypothesis and conjecture.

The amount of the debt has been inferred, from the course of the trade, to have been equal to the amount of two years' exports at the breaking out of the war; and it has been so inferred from the facts relied on relative to the degree and extent of credit acquiesced in, and the uniform practice of balancing the annual debts and credits, and carrying on the balances to the next yearly account, with interest at six and seven, and, in some instances, at eight per cent.; which facts are understood not to be resisted by Mr. King, though the general conclusion is denied.

An augmentation to this estimate is shown to be due on the score of the loyalists who were not traders, which is conceded by Mr. King to a limited extent.

A further augmentation, though at first denied to be due, is also conceded on the score of freight, insurance, and mercantile profit.

And against the general result of the argument, as concluded by Mr. Anstey, Mr. King has opposed a new and distinct mode of estimating the debt, by contrasting the exports and imports, with reference to the claims presented at Philadelphia, and a partial view of the balance of the trade from the southern colonies; a principle of computation which leads, as Mr. Anstey has shown, to a most extravagant conclusion, and serves only to prove that, as a criterion, it is altogether inadequate to the purpose for which it is relied on. And, lastly, it has been shown that, by applying the same principle of balancing the exports into the colonies from Great Britain, against the imports from them, of the whole trade, instead of a part, the result will be a sum demonstrable on the face of the document from the customs in favor of the former, approaching nearly to the sum which the principle first chosen by Mr. King, of calculating upon the exports only, yields upon Mr. Anstey's process of calculation, proved, as he conceives it to be, (as fully as the nature of such an estimate will admit of,) by the facts, arguments, and inferences above submitted.

It is upon these grounds that Mr. Anstey considers himself entitled to estimate the debt as it stood at the commencement of the war, as follows:

1st. A sum equal to two years' credit of exports, valued with reference to the Inspector General's certificate, and an equal division of the excess between the convoy price and the official standard of valuation of the year 1697, at - - - - - - - - - -	£6,541,952
2d. A sum equal to one-third of the sum originally claimed on the score of debts by the loyalists who were not traders, but only taken, at - - - - - - - - - -	500,000
3d. A sum chargeable on one-third of the trade carried on by factors, agents, and partnership houses, on the score of freight, shipping charges, insurance, and mercantile profit, at forty-five per cent.; but, considering the nature of the retail trade in America, taken only at twenty-five per cent.,	545,162
Making, on the whole debt, at the breaking out of the American war, - -	£7,587,114

A sum nearly corresponding with the balance between the exports and imports to and from the colonies for nine years prior to, and independent of, the influence of the war.

If the principle of deduction assumed by Mr. King, in his letter to Lord Grenville, of the 23d of November last, be allowed to operate on the above estimate, in the proportion therein supposed to be just and reasonable, the statement will be as follows:

Debt due at the commencement of the war, according to Mr. Anstey's estimate, as above, -	£7,587,114
Deduct amount of one-half of the above, (as proposed by Mr. King,) on the score of supposed insolvency during the war, the balance will be, - - - - - - - - - -	3,793,557
Deduct (as supposed by Mr. King) amount of actual recovery since the peace, one-half of the above balance, - - - - - - - - - - - - - -	1,896,778
Double the amount, as proposed or conceded by Mr. King, on the score of interest, the sum will be as before, - - - - - - - - - - - - - -	3,793,557

From the above sum, Mr. King proposes to deduct no less than two-thirds, on the score of probable and eventual recovery, for the reasons assigned in his paper last delivered, in addition to those in his first statement to Lord Grenville, in his letter of the 23d November last; which deduction leaves a balance of one million two hundred and sixty-four thousand five hundred and nineteen pounds, to be paid by the United States, as a commutation for the sixth article of the treaty.

But the principles of deduction assumed by Mr. King, though allowable to a certain extent, are by no means conceded by Mr. Anstey, in the proportion contended for.

It is not, however, purposed in this place to enter into a detail of all the objections which have occurred to him in the consideration of these topics; inasmuch as the above sum of one million two hundred and sixty-four thousand five hundred and nineteen pounds, which, by his statement, appears to be due on the balance against Mr. King's deductions, already so far exceeds what Mr. King has authority to offer in commutation of the article in question: he will, however, take the liberty of stating, generally, with respect to the first head of deduction, in the proportion of a moiety on the score of supposed insolvency during the war, that his objection rests chiefly on a fact which, in his judgment, has considerable weight against Mr. King's hypothesis, viz:

That, although the ruin and impoverishment of individuals in particular cases, during the first struggles and distractions of the country, consequent upon the revolution, may be supposed to have been in a degree unavoidable, especially in those States which became the theatre of the war, it is well known the inhabitants in general were enriched by the great influx of wealth brought from the West Indies, and particularly from the Havanna, towards the close of the war, and the quantity of specie which the French and British armies left behind them on the return of peace: witness the continual remittances from the United States to Great Britain by the packets of every month, during the years 1784, '5, '6, and '7, in satisfaction of new debts, contracted on the credit of the immense cargoes of British merchandise exported upon speculation immediately subsequent to that period.

As to the deduction of a moiety of the balance, on the score of actual recovery since the peace, it is not material to contest it in an estimate of this nature, proceeding upon general principles; though, doubtless, the hypothesis would apply more closely to the fact, if the calculations were to be made with reference to the moiety in number of States which have discharged their debts, rather than with reference to the aggregate debt due at any one time from all the States, made without any distinction as to the quota of debt actually paid by each.

But the main objection, as it strikes Mr. Anstey, is to the deduction proposed in the proportion of two-thirds of the remainder, on the score of probable and eventual recovery.

But upon this topic also, at this time, Mr. Anstey will observe, generally, that it does not appear to him, upon inquiry, or upon the statements made by Mr. King, that any new facilities have been lately afforded to British creditors in the recovery of their debts, which have removed the grounds and causes of complaint alleged in the sixth article of the treaty of amity, &c., so as to justify a deduction in the proportion of two-thirds; a deduction of one-half of the remainder is surely, at all events, as much as, under all circumstances, can be allowed to have any foundation in the experience of facts: for the fact calculated upon by Mr. King, in order to found his second head of deduction, is, that one-half, and not two-thirds of the debt remaining due at the peace, has been since recovered; that is, recovered within the last seventeen years. If, therefore, only a moiety has been recovered during so long a period of years, where is the sanction for the recovery of a still greater proportion in a less time? If there be a material difference (which is highly probable) in the present circumstances of the debtors, compared with their former situation, it must indeed have the effect of shortening the period within which so much of the solvable debt may be recovered, as shall not be impeded by the causes of complaint assigned in the article; but if no new facilities, operating to the removal of those causes of complaint, have been afforded since the treaty, an amelioration of the debtors' circumstances will not, in Mr. Anstey's opinion, better the condition of the creditors in the proportion imagined by Mr. King.

The law and the constitution of the judiciary of the United States remaining the same, the ability of the debtor to pay cannot be supposed to influence the recovery of that part of the debt which, confessedly, at the time of framing the article, stood obstructed by the operation of lawful impediments since the peace.

RUFUS KING, Esq. &c.

No. 28.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, March 20, 1801.

Mr. King has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Anstey's note of the 18th instant, together with his reply of the 14th ultimo to Mr. King's note of the 29th of January.

To whatever remarks a considerable portion of this reply may be liable, it is not perceived that any advantage can be expected from the further discussion of the subordinate questions which have arisen in the course of this correspondence, while so material a difference of opinions shall continue in respect to the chief point to which they relate. The following facts have been repeatedly stated, and are believed to be incontestable:

1st. The credits given to American debtors in no instance exceeded the term of twelve months.

2d. The course of payments, subject to casual and particular exceptions, was annual.

3d. During the last year of the mutual dealings of the parties, the new debt did not exceed a tenth part of its usual amount, while the payments were at least equal to those of any former year.

From these facts, Mr. King has inferred that the debt, when the war put an end to new credits on one side, and further payments on the other, did not exceed the average value of the goods exported in a single year from Great Britain to the colonies forming the United States. From the same facts, Mr. Anstey continues to estimate the debt at double that sum. This essential difference of opinions, derived from facts which have been fully explained and understood, naturally brings the negotiation to a point; and as the adjustment of other concerns of equal importance, and the delay of which is attended with great disadvantage to the United States, is connected with, and may be affected by the conclusion of this discussion, Mr. King is unwilling, by any further observations on his part, to protract a negotiation which, from various causes, has already attained an unexpected and inconvenient duration.

SIR: LONDON, April 21, 1801.

Although the negotiation respecting the debts is not yet concluded, and I am unable to give you any positive assurance how, or even when, it will be, I have thought it proper that I should avail myself of the opportunity of Mr. Sitgreaves's return, to send you a copy of my correspondence upon this subject.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury, dated

MY LORD: GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, March 10, 1801.

I have thought it would be saving your lordship both time and trouble, in respect to the several points which have been for some time in discussion with your predecessor, if they were presented in a connected form, and accompanied by such references and observations as should, in a concise manner, expose the motives in favor of their adoption.

The enclosed paper, marked A, contains these points, in the shape of distinct propositions, to which the requisite form may be given, should they be adopted as additional articles to our treaty of amity and commerce.

My correspondence with Lord Grenville and Mr. Anstey, relative to the first proposition, has been so full, that it does not seem necessary to add any thing further upon that head.

The second proposition was fully examined and settled in the summer of 1799, and its formal adoption was deferred until an agreement could be made respecting the subject of the first. My correspondence with Lord Grenville, and between his lordship and the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, contain what passed on that occasion.

In the enclosed papers, marked B, C, and D, I have suggested the considerations which we have to offer in favor of the third, fourth, and fifth articles.

I am aware that other questions of importance continue to engage the attention of His Majesty's ministers; but our affairs having so long and almost habitually given way to others which have been thought more urgent, I cannot refrain from observing, what indeed the tenor of my instructions, as well as my observation of the irritation and difficulty proceeding from their unsettled state, requires me to do, that a further delay in bringing them to a decision, from whatever cause it may arise, and in spite of any representation which I could make, will unavoidably tend to impair that mutual good will and confidence, which is the best security against any measure that in its operation might weaken the harmony and good understanding between our respective countries.

With the highest consideration and respect, &c.

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury, dated

MY LORD: GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, April 1, 1801.

I take the liberty to recall to your lordship's recollection the letter which I had the honor to write to you on the 10th ultimo.

The unsettled situation of the business to which that letter relates is productive of great and increasing disadvantage to the United States: and, although its adjustment may be matter of secondary consideration, and for this reason may continue to be postponed to other and more pressing concerns on the part of His Majesty's Government, it is nevertheless a subject, not only of great importance, but of the most urgent nature on the part of the United States. Having had reason to expect that a final adjustment of the mutual claims of the two countries would have been effected before the close of the last year, I sent to my Government information to this effect, and, from time to time, have likewise explained what I have conceived to be the causes of the delays which have since arisen. The negotiation having been reduced to precise points, which have been fully discussed, it has become my duty to transmit to my Government more authentic information respecting the delay which still prevents its conclusion; and to enable me to do so, I take the liberty to request your lordship to inform me whether His Majesty's Government has, or is likely soon to come to any decision respecting the several propositions referred to in my letter to your lordship of the 10th ultimo.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

MY LORD: GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, April 15, 1801.

Mr. Sitgreaves, one of the commissioners under the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the United States and Great Britain, and who came to this country for the sole purpose of assisting me in a negotiation for the adjustment of the disagreement which had arisen in the execution of that article, after having remained here for more than a year, has lately received the President's permission to return home; and it being my intention to transmit by him, for the President's information, copies of the correspondence upon this subject, which I have had with His Majesty's Government, I am solicitous to accompany the same with the most authentic information in my power to obtain, in respect to the probable issue of the negotiation. Mr. Sitgreaves will leave London on the 21st instant, and I take the liberty to renew the inquiry, whether His Majesty's Government has yet so far considered the subject of the letters which I have had the honor to address to your lordship, that it will be in your lordship's power, before Mr. Sitgreaves's departure, to give me any answer to the same?

With perfect consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

LONDON, May 1, 1801.

From Lord St. Vincent's I went to Lord Hawkesbury, agreeably to his appointment; and upon the subject which, notwithstanding my unremitted attention, bestowed in every quarter likely to promote its progress, has been so long delayed, his lordship, after expressing his regret that the business had not been settled before Lord Grenville went out of office, and excusing the delay which, on several accounts, had since taken place, told me, that so far as regarded himself, he had, in respect to the settlement of the affair of the debts, come to a decision; that he must, however, confer with his colleagues, and particularly with the Lord Chancellor Eldon; but that he was himself disposed to close with the offer which I had made, and which is mentioned in more than one of my letters. On my suggesting the great disadvantage of further delay, arising from a minute examination of the subject by the Chancellor, he replied that he would have a conversation with him, and that he presumed that his opinion might be formed from a general view of the question; and, therefore, that no considerable delay would be likely to happen.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

DEAR SIR: LONDON, May 30, 1801.

Since the date of my letter communicating Lord Hawkesbury's sentiments respecting the debts, I have seen and conversed with Mr. Addington, who told me that he had called up the subject in the cabinet, as he had before assured me he would do, and that he had expressed his solicitude that it should be brought to a decision; adding that, as the question, from its nature and circumstances, was not susceptible of exact proof, it was not extraordinary that it should appear in various lights to different persons; but, as the mutual harmony of the two countries, in a certain degree, depended upon its being settled, it was, in his opinion, desirable that a measure in its consequences of so much importance should be no longer deferred. Our conversation extended itself to other objects, affecting the intercourse and friendship between the two nations; upon all of which he expressed himself with liberality, concerning the depredations upon our trade, committed by their cruising ships: he said that orders had been despatched immediately after he came into office to their naval commanders, in every quarter of the world, requiring them to respect the rights of neutrals, and to exercise those of belligerents with the greatest moderation; and, as measures were in train to reform the Vice Admiralty courts, he was determined, likewise, to adopt such means as should prevent the delay heretofore complained of in the proceedings of the Court of Appeals.

Yesterday I met, by appointment, the Lord Chancellor, who informed me that he had fully examined, and made up his opinion concerning the subject of the debts; but that it was proper, before he mentioned it to me, that he should communicate it to his colleagues, which he engaged to do without delay. I asked him if he had looked into the papers respecting the Maryland bank stock? He replied that he had sent to his predecessor for them, and as they had already been before him, the looking of them over again would require but little time and attention.

From these communications, joined to what Lord Hawkesbury had before said to me, we may, I think, infer that the business will now be decided in a short time: whether the decision will close the negotiation upon the terms I have proposed, is more than I know; though I am inclined to hope that this will be the case.

LONDON, July 10, 1801.

I complained in strong terms, of the delay which still continues in concluding our discussions respecting the sixth article, and was explicitly assured that the cabinet would come to a decision upon that subject in the course of a fortnight.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

DEAR SIR: LONDON, August 24, 1801.

Although I considered myself authorized, by Mr. Lincoln's letter of the 25th of April, to press the negotiation respecting the sixth article of the treaty of 1794 to a conclusion, upon the terms mentioned in my No. 6, it has nevertheless been no small satisfaction to me to receive your letter of the 15th of June, containing the President's explicit sanction of my intentions upon this subject.

The day after receiving it, Lord Hawkesbury having previously requested me to meet him in Downing-street, informed me that the cabinet, after maturely considering the subject, was unanimously of opinion that not less than a million and a half sterling could be deemed a full equivalent for the abolition of the sixth article; but that, from a strong and sincere desire to attain an amicable and final settlement of the business, it had consented to accept the sum we had offered, if the terms of payment could be satisfactorily adjusted, and provision made that the American courts should be open in future.

A conversation of some length and difficulty ensued upon these two points. Among other plans, that of applying the money in payment of the awards which should be made in favor of our citizens under the seventh article, was suggested by me, and decidedly objected to by Lord Hawkesbury, on the ground that it would produce confusion, and was moreover an unnecessary departure from the first agreement. His lordship proposed that we should engage to enact a law providing that our courts should in future be open to the British creditors, and that the federal courts should have original jurisdiction in cases under ten pounds sterling. To this proposition, after explaining what I conceived to be the present satisfactory footing of our courts, I explicitly answered, that, having experienced so much difficulty from the stipulations heretofore made concerning the old debts, we could not consent to enter into any new ones respecting them: that the treaty of peace was still in force, and that its provisions were well understood, and sufficient to protect the rights of the creditors on both sides: that the sum to be paid, in lieu of the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, must be understood to be in full satisfaction of all claims recoverable at the close of the war, but which cannot now be recovered in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings; and in respect to such claims as can now be so recovered, nothing more can fairly be required of us than to recognize the future operation of the fourth article of the treaty of peace, which we were willing to do. The conference, so far as respects these points, was here closed by Lord Hawkesbury requesting me to draw up and send him the project of a convention conformable to the tenor of this conversation. This I lost no time in doing.

The project, which has been several days in his lordship's hands, provides that the sixth article of the treaty of 1794 shall be cancelled and annulled, and, in lieu thereof, that the United States will pay at the city of Washington, to such person as shall be authorized on the part of His Britannic Majesty to receive the same, the sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, in three equal annual instalments, without interest; the first instalment to be paid in one year after the exchange of the ratifications of the convention, and four dollars and forty-four cents to be reckoned equal to a pound sterling. The project likewise declares that nothing in the convention shall be construed to abolish or suspend the future operation of the fourth article of the treaty of peace, which, so far as regards such future operation, is recognized and confirmed.

It was Lord Hawkesbury's choice to give to this settlement the form of a separate convention, rather than that of additional articles. In respect to the proposed additional articles relative to contraband, the Maryland bank stock, the impressment of seamen, and the port of New Orleans, Lord Hawkesbury told me that he foresaw no material objection to any of them, except that which regards New Orleans: that they were truly desirous to avoid the interruption of the trade of our people through the Mississippi; but that, having reason to be satisfied that Spain has ceded the Floridas, including New Orleans, to France, they could not, without disregarding their own security, consent to the proposed article concerning our trade to that island.

I expressed my hope and expectation that there would be no further delay in the conclusion of the other additional articles: he replied that he must take the final decision of his colleagues, especially of Lord St. Vincent, concerning them, as well as upon the project of the convention: that this, however, would require but a few days.

I then observed that the settlement concerning the sixth article would remove the suspension of the commission under the seventh; and as the commissioners under this article were dispersed, it would be proper to take immediate measures to re-assemble them. Lord Hawkesbury assented; and I charged myself with this service. I thought it prudent to avoid the appearance of solicitude upon this head, as the commutation of the sixth article, with an understanding that the seventh is to be executed according to its provisions, instead of being likewise commuted, which has been again and again urged, has been one of the most delicate parts of the negotiation. I have prepared and sent to Lord Hawkesbury a draught of the additional articles, and Lord St. Vincent has since informed me that they shall receive his approbation.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

SIR: LONDON, October 4, 1801.

I have expected, during the last fortnight, that I should be able to close the negotiation respecting the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, in season to send the result by Mr. Dawson; but as he is on the point of embarking, and the business still remains open, I can only transmit the annexed report of what has passed since the date of my No. 32. Be the consequence what it may, I shall decline entering into any new engagement, which may vary from or enlarge the stipulations of the treaty of peace, being fully satisfied that a departure from this decision would lay the foundation of a future controversy. After waiting a reasonable time, I purpose, in case I do not hear further from Lord Hawkesbury, to send him a note demanding a decisive answer.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Note of conferences, &c. with Lord Hawkesbury and others, concerning the convention relative to the sixth article of the treaty of 1794.

AUGUST 19, 1801.

Lord Hawkesbury communicated to me the cabinet's decision to accept the sum of six hundred thousand pounds, if the payment could be satisfactorily arranged, and provision made that our courts should be open in future. Upon these points, a free conversation ensued: the first of them was soon settled; the other proved more difficult. On one side, new stipulations were required in favor of the creditors; on the other, it was contended that nothing more could be asked or granted, than a recognition of the future operation of the fourth article of the treaty of peace. The observations, in support of this opinion, so far prevailed, that, at the close of the conference, Lord Hawkesbury requested me to prepare and send him the draught of a convention conformable to the tenor of our conference, in order that he might submit it to the consideration of his colleagues.

AUGUST 20.

Sent the following letter to Lord Hawkesbury:

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

MY LORD: GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, August 20, 1801.

I have the honor to send your lordship herewith the project of a convention concerning the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, drawn up according to the tenor of our conference of yesterday. I am not aware that any part of it requires explanation, except the clause in the first article declarative of the relative value of the money of the United States and that of Great Britain: from the fluctuation of the exchange between America and England, bills at one time commanding a premium of five or seven per cent., and at another time being at a discount of eight, and even ten per cent., I have thought it would be advisable to provide that the instalments should be paid at par, having regard to the relative value of the pure or standard silver contained in our respective coins. Four dollars and forty-four cents, or hundredths, for one pound sterling is that par.

I take the liberty of suggesting the expediency of our executing three originals, to guard against the accidents which might attend the transmission of a single copy to America.

As the claim of the State of Maryland is so analogous to the claims provided for by this convention, I rely upon it that no further delay or difficulty will attend the completion of the proposed articles upon that and the other subjects, concerning which no difference of opinion appeared in our last conference.

With perfect consideration and respect. I have the honor to be,

Your lordship's obedient and most humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

PROJECT.

Difficulties having arisen in the execution of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London on the 4th day of November, 1794, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America: and the parties to the said treaties being equally desirous, by friendly explanations, to secure the object of the said article in a manner which may prove mutually satisfactory, have respectively named plenipotentiaries for this purpose; that is to say, His Britannic Majesty has named for his plenipotentiary the right honorable ——— ———, one of His Majesty's privy council, and His Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and the President of the States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, has named Rufus King, Esq. minister plenipotentiary of the said United States to His said Majesty, who have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1st. The aforesaid sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, shall, and hereby is, declared to be cancelled and annulled, except so far as the same may relate to the execution of the seventh article of the same treaty; and in lieu and satisfaction of the money which the United States might have been liable to pay in pursuance of the provisions of the said sixth article, the United States of America hereby engage to pay, and His Britannic Majesty consents to accept, for the use of the persons described in the said sixth article, the sum of ——— sterling, payable at the times, and place, and in the manner following, that is to say: the said sum of ——— sterling shall be paid at the city of Washington, within the said United States, in three annual instalments of ——— each, and to such person or persons as shall be authorized on the part of His Britannic Majesty to receive the same. The first of the said instalments shall be paid at the expiration of one year; the second instalment at the expiration of two years; and the third and last instalment at the expiration of three years next following the exchange of the ratifications of this convention. And to prevent any disagreement concerning the rate of exchanges, the said payments shall be made in the money of the said United States, reckoning four dollars and forty-four cents to be equal to one pound sterling.

ART. 2d. Nothing contained in this convention shall be construed or taken to abolish or suspend the future operation of the fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace, concluded at Paris on the 3d day of September, in the year 1783, between His Britannic Majesty and the said United States; but the same, so far as respects its future operation, is hereby recognized and confirmed.

ART. 3d. This convention, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the respective ratifications duly exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory upon His Majesty and the said United States. In faith whereof, we, the the said plenipotentiaries of His Britannic Majesty, and of the United States of America, have signed this convention, and caused to be affixed thereto our respective seals.

Done at London this ——— day of ———, one thousand eight hundred and one.

LONDON, August 20, 1801.

AUGUST 22.

Mr. Hammond, the under secretary, having suggested some objections which had been made to the draft of the convention, I consented to new-model the second article, for the purpose of reciting in it the fourth article of the treaty of peace.

SEPTEMBER 10.

Wrote the following letter to Lord Hawkesbury.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.—(Private.)

MY LORD: MILL HILL, MIDDLESEX, September 10, 1801.

Unless our business be expeditiously finished, another year will elapse before it can be finally closed. Congress alone can make provision for the stipulated payments: this body meets but once a year, and will soon assemble, and the season is at hand when passages to America are rare, long, and precarious. I, therefore, take the liberty of pressing upon your lordship the necessity of this business being completed without further delay, in order that I may be enabled to forward it to America in time to be ratified during the approaching session of Congress. I will do myself the honor to wait upon your lordship on Saturday, or any other day which may be convenient to you, for the purpose of explaining to you the very peculiar and disagreeable condition of our ships which have been detained in their voyages to Havre de Grace, for which port I have reason to believe that several other vessels are now on their passages from America. I flatter myself that, being fully understood, our difficulties on this head will immediately cease.

With perfect respect and consideration, I have the honor to be your lordship's obedient and most humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

SEPTEMBER 22.

In a conference with Lord Hawkesbury, he informed me that the project of a convention was in the hands of the Lord Chancellor, who wished to see me for the purpose of settling the words to be made use of in respect to the future operation of the treaty of peace; that the sum and instalments being agreed upon, as soon as the Chancellor and I could could settle the article respecting future impediments, he would conclude the convention with me. On my return home, sent a note to the Chancellor, stating what Lord Hawkesbury had communicated to me, and desiring to meet him, in order that the article in question might be agreed upon.

SEPTEMBER 23.

The Lord Chancellor called upon me, and, after alluding to the complaints to which, he said, they should be exposed, on account of the six hundred thousand pounds being less than the creditors expected, resumed (what I thought had been settled with Mr. Hammond) the discussion of the second article of the project, in which he proposed several alterations, and delivered to me the following draught containing them, together with a new article relative to the rights of creditors.

Draught of the Chancellor.

Difficulties having arisen in the execution of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London, on the 4th day of November, 1794, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America; and the parties to the said treaty being equally desirous to promote mutual friendship, and, as far as may be, to obviate such difficulties, have respectively named plenipotentiaries to treat and agree respecting the same; that is to say, His Britannic Majesty has named for his plenipotentiary —— ——, and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, has named —— ——, who have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

1. In satisfaction and discharge of the money which the United States might have been liable to pay, in pursuance of the provisions of the said sixth article, the United States of America hereby engage to pay, and His Britannic Majesty consents to accept, for the use of the persons described in the said sixth article, the sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, payable at the times and place, and in the manner following, that is to say: the said sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling shall be paid at the city of Washington, within the said United States, in three annual instalments of two hundred thousand pounds sterling each, and to such person or persons as shall be authorized, on the part of His Britannic Majesty, to receive the same; the first of the said instalments to be paid at the end of one year, the second instalment at the expiration of two years, and the third and last instalment at the expiration of three years next following the exchange of the ratifications of this convention. And, to prevent any disagreement concerning the rate of exchanges, the said payments shall be made in the money of the said United States, reckoning four dollars and forty-four cents to be equal to one pound sterling.

2. Whereas, it is agreed by the fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace concluded at Paris, on the third day of September in the year 1783, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, that the creditors on either side should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money, of all bonâ fide debts theretofore contracted, it is hereby understood and declared that nothing contained in this convention shall be construed or taken to abolish, suspend, or in any manner affect, the operation in future of the said fourth article of the definitive treaty; but that the same, so far as respects its operation in future, is hereby recognized and confirmed, and declared to be binding and obligatory upon His Britannic Majesty and the said United States; and the same shall be observed with punctuality and the most sincere regard to good faith.

3. (new article.) It is hereby further agreed that neither the payment of the aforesaid sum of six hundred thousand pounds, nor any thing contained in this convention, shall be deemed or taken in any manner to abolish, suspend, or affect the right of any creditor to recover against his debtor, according to the course of judicial proceedings in the courts of the respective countries, the full payment and satisfaction of what is or may be due to him.

4. This convention, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the respective ratifications duly exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory upon His Majesty and the said United States.

In faith, &c.

I pointed out one or two amendments in the second article of his draught, and, in particular, the insertion of a clause abolishing the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, and the restoration of the expression "future operation," instead of "operation in future," which might be construed to relate to the claims of the creditors, as they existed at the date of the treaty of peace; the six hundred thousand pounds will satisfy all losses up to this time, from whatever cause they may have arisen; and these losses, as well as the payments which have been received, must have diminished the claims. The Chancellor assented; adding, that he considered the convention to be a final settlement between the two Governments. In respect to the new article, I desired a little time to consider it, observing, however, that I wanted none to state that I could enter into no stipulation defining the rights of the creditors, or engaging in their favor any thing more than had been promised in the treaty of peace.

SEPTEMBER 24.

The Chancellor called upon me again, and began by saying he felt the force of my objection to any definition of the rights of the creditors, and had, therefore, recast the article so as to avoid it. The new draught, which he left my consideration, is in the following words:

[Clause to be substituted in lieu of the third article.]

"It is further declared and agreed, that neither the payment of the said sum of six hundred thousand pounds, nor any thing herein contained, shall be deemed or taken to prevent any creditor from proceeding, for the recovery and satisfaction of what is or may be due to him, in the courts of the respective countries, according to the course of judicial proceedings therein, and according to the true intent and meaning of the second article herein contained."

In the evening I sent the Lord Chancellor the following letter:

Mr. King to Lord Eldon.—(Private.)

MY LORD: GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, September 24, 1801.

I return enclosed to your lordship the project which we have been discussing, and consent to the substitute for the third article which you have delivered to me this morning.

The addition of the clause abolishing the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, and which may be introduced at the top of the second page, with the transposition of a word or two in the second article, which I have made, are the only alterations desired.

I pray your lordship to send the project, as now settled, to Lord Hawkesbury, in order that it may be engrossed, so as to be executed immediately. As I have, in relation to this business, manifested a disposition to fall in with what has been deemed requisite to meet complaints which may arise on one side, I must beg of your lordship, in return, to enable me, by an arrangement respecting the Maryland bank stock to bear up against the dissatisfaction which may occur on the other.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be your lordship's most obedient and humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

SEPTEMBER 26.

Received the following letter from the Chancellor:

Lord Eldon to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, Saturday, September 26, 1801.

DEAR SIR:

I have taken all the means in my power to avoid postponing the visit I promised you from this day till Monday, but I find myself obliged so to do, and shall call upon you on Monday about one o'clock.

I am, dear sir, very faithfully, and with much respect, your obedient servant,

ELDON.

SEPTEMBER 28.

Received the following note, with its enclosure, from Lord Hawkesbury.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, Monday, September 28, 1801.

Lord Hawkesbury presents his compliments to Mr. King, and encloses him a copy of the American treaty, as it has been altered. Lord Hawkesbury will thank Mr. King to meet the Lord Chancellor in Downing-street, on Wednesday, at half past twelve o'clock.

NEW PROJECT.

Difficulties having arisen in the execution of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, concluded at London on the 4th day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America; and the parties to the said treaty being equally desirous to promote mutual friendship, and, as far as may be, to obviate such difficulties, have respectively named plenipotentiaries to treat and agree respecting the same: that is to say, His Britannic Majesty has named for his plenipotentiary, ——— ———, and the President of the United States, by and with the advice of the Senate, has named ——— ———, who have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

I. In satisfaction and discharge of the money which the United States might have been liable to pay, in pursuance of the provisions of the said sixth article, which is hereby declared to be cancelled and annulled, except so far as the same may relate to the execution of the seventh article of the same treaty, the United States of America hereby engage to pay, and His Britannic Majesty consents to accept, for the use of the persons described in the said sixth article, the sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling payable at the times and place, and in the manner following: that is to say, the said sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, shall be paid at the city of Washington, within the said United States, in three annual instalments of two hundred thousand pounds sterling each, and to such person or persons as shall be authorized by His Britannic Majesty to receive the same; the first of the said instalments to be paid at the end of one year, the second instalment at the expiration of two years, and the third and last instalment at the expiration of three years next following the exchange of the ratifications of this convention. And to prevent any disagreement concerning the rate of exchanges, the said payments shall be made in the money of the said United States, reckoning four dollars and forty-four cents to be equal to one pound sterling.

II. Whereas, it is agreed by the fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace, concluded at Paris on the third day of September, 1783, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, that creditors, on either side, should meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money, of all bonâ fide debts heretofore contracted, it is hereby declared, that the said fourth article, so far as respects its future operation, is hereby recognized and confirmed, and the same is hereby declared to be binding and obligatory upon His Britannic Majesty and the said United States, and the same shall be accordingly observed with punctuality and good faith, and so as that no creditor, on either side, shall hereafter meet with any lawful impediment to such recovery as aforesaid.

III. It is further declared and agreed, that neither the payment of the said sum of six hundred thousand pounds, nor any thing herein contained, shall be deemed or taken to prevent any creditor from proceeding for the recovery and satisfaction of what is or may be due to him, in the courts of the respective countries, according to the course of judicial proceedings therein, and according to the true intent and meaning of the second article herein contained.

IV. This convention, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the respective ratifications duly exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory upon His Majesty and the said United States. For faith, &c.

SEPTEMBER 30.

On going to Downing street, Mr. Hammond informed me, that, owing to unexpected and pressing business, Lord Hawkesbury would not be able to meet the Chancellor and me till Friday, October 2d. The Chancellor arriving just as I was leaving Lord Hawkesbury's office, we entered into a short conversation respecting the two following papers, which I delivered to him, and which he promised to examine before our meeting on Friday.

Observations upon the following clause, proposed to be added to the second article of the convention, viz:

"And so as that no creditor, on either side, shall hereafter meet with any lawful impediment to such recovery as aforesaid."

Had the sixth article of the treaty of 1794 been duly executed, no new or further provision would have been proposed, or necessary, to secure the rights of the creditors on the side of Great Britain. If the claims under that article be converted into a definite sum by a convention for this purpose, the legal effect must, in every respect, be the same as though the article had been duly executed; and hence, it could not have been foreseen or expected that any stipulations, concerning the rights of the creditors, would be proposed to be added to such convention.

With a view to popular misconceptions, rather than from any doubt respecting the legal effect upon the rights of creditors, of the commutation of the claims under the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, it has been agreed to insert an article confirmatory of the future operations of the fourth article of the treaty of peace; and from the same motive, another article has been proposed and added, by which it is declared, that neither the payment of the six hundred thousand pounds, nor any thing contained in the convention, shall operate to prevent the said creditors from recovering any debts which may be due to them in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, and according to the true intent and meaning of the fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace.

These articles, as it is conceived, leave the creditors to the merit of their respective claims, the recovery whereof is protected by the fourth article of the treaty of peace. What are the losses which have arisen from legal impediments, and which are to be compensated by the six hundred thousand pounds, and which are the debts which may be still recovered in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, are questions left to be decided upon the particular circumstances belonging to the several cases.

The clause proposed to be added to the second article will materially affect this just and necessary mode of proceeding, inasmuch as creditors are thereby to recover, not according to their rights at this time, but according to their rights at the conclusion of the treaty of peace. A stipulation of this extent cannot be admitted, because losses have been sustained for which compensation to a great amount is about to be made: this will affect the rights of creditors; and a stipulation applicable to them, in their primitive state, will be inapplicable to their present circumstances.

To avoid misconstructions, arising from the cumulative stipulations of the second and third articles, it is proper to add the following article, declaratory of the true effect of the six hundred thousand pounds, engaged by the proposed convention, viz:

ART. 4. "It is further declared and agreed that the payment of the said six hundred thousand pounds shall operate and be received in full satisfaction and discharge of all such bona fide debts due to, and recoverable by, creditors on the side of His Britannic Majesty, at the date of the said definitive treaty of peace, and according to the provisions thereof, as cannot now be had and received according to the true intent and meaning of the fourth article of the said definitive treaty of peace, and in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings."

OCTOBER 2.

Went to Downing street agreeably to Lord Hawkesbury's appointment. His lordship was prepared to receive my compliments upon the preliminaries of peace with France, which were signed last night, but wholly unprepared to say any thing more respecting my business than that he had seen the Chancellor, and that it would be requisite for him to bring the subject again before the cabinet. I asked when this would be done, and expressed pretty strongly my impatience at the delays which had taken place. He replied that he could not name a day, but that it should be soon.

It is now evident that little attention has been bestowed upon our affairs; the negotiation with France having excluded the consideration of all other subjects.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

"LONDON, November 30, 1801.

"Nothing decisive has yet taken place respecting the sixth and seventh articles of our treaty with this country: I shall, however, be able to send you more explicit, and, I am willing to hope, more satisfactory information upon this subject, in the course of the next month."

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, January 9, 1802.

At length I am enabled to send you a convention, which I yesterday signed with Lord Hawkesbury, respecting the sixth and seventh articles of our treaty of 1794. The commutation of the sixth article of the treaty of 1794, and the confirmation, so far as respects its future operation, of the fourth article of the treaty of peace, remain as they were settled in October last; and I have nothing to add to my former reports upon these points. The claim upon us, to consent to a commutation of the seventh article, has been given up; and it is agreed that the commissioners shall immediately re-assemble, and proceed in the execution of their duties, according to the provisions of the article; except only that, instead of their awards being made payable at such times as they should appoint, the same shall be payable in three equal instalments, corresponding with those to be paid in America.

As our claims are to be ascertained by the Board of Commissioners, which has heretofore added interest up to the day on which its awards were made payable, and which is at liberty to do so, in respect to their future awards, the payment by instalments may not be thought a material disadvantage: the main point, that of ascertaining the amount of our claims, being satisfactorily secured. Having already burdened my correspondence with pieces and reports upon these subjects, which, I fear, have been thought both tedious and uninteresting, I do not add, by way of supplement, a particular account of what has passed since the date of my No. 40, especially as the discussion has related solely to the commission in London; the agreement respecting which is too explicit to stand in need of explanations.

Two copies of the convention have been executed; one of which will be enclosed with the original of this letter; two more copies are preparing, and will, in like manner, be executed as originals, and enclosed with the duplicate and triplicate hereof. I shall likewise send you copies of Lord Hawkesbury's full powers, as soon as they can be prepared; those which I made use of are dated June 10, 1796. Lord Hawkesbury has agreed to send a copy of the third article of the convention to the British commissioners; in like manner, I shall send a copy of it to the American commissioners; and, as they are all upon the spot, they will be at liberty to resume their business without further delay. It will, perhaps, be thought most convenient that the ratifications should be exchanged here.

The Lord Chancellor has assured me that the Maryland claim shall speedily be decided in his court: a measure, it seems, deemed necessary to enable the crown to signify its pleasure respecting the bank stock. Although the disappointments we have met with, upon this subject, must weaken our confidence in the course we have been pursuing, I think it would be impolitic, at present, to change it: the claim, which in my conviction is most just, shall continue to receive my unremitted attention.

With perfect respect and esteem I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, January 11, 1802.

Although, for the reason suggested, I have omitted to send you an account of what passed respecting the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of 1794, subsequent to Mr. Dawson's departure, I have, on reflection, thought it might be satisfactory, and perhaps useful, that I should, in this way, supply the omission.

Lord Grenville, on being consulted by Lord Hawkesbury, having given an explicit opinion that he had in no respect pledged the Government concerning the settlement of the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of 1794; and that the execution of the latter article, according to its provisions, would be a measure which ought to have a material influence in the ascertainment of the sum to be accepted for the abolition of the former, I prepared, and sent to Mr. Addington, a concise view of the origin, progress, and present situation of the negotiation, corresponding with a more detailed statement, which I likewise sent to the Lord Chancellor, and a copy of which is annexed. Special considerations induced me to prefer this manner of making the representation to one that would have been more regular, and which I remained at liberty to make, should circumstances require it. In subsequent conversations with Mr. Addington, I had reason to be satisfied with the steps I had taken: for he told me that he saw the subject in its true light, and was ready to admit that, to those who were ignorant of personal characters, the objection, if persisted in, would unavoidably have the appearance of a mere expedient. To him, as well as Lord Hawkesbury, I took pains to explain the mutual advantages of a friendly settlement, and the impossibility that I could consent to change the footing upon which the question was now placed.

The business remained in this situation until the middle of December, when Lord Hawkesbury informed me that, having again been considered by the cabinet, it had been decided to close the affair of the sixth article upon the terms which had already been settled; and to agree that the commissioners under the seventh article should proceed, provided their awards, instead of being payable as they should appoint, should be payable by instalments, corresponding with those to be paid in America; and the money deposited in the Bank of England, to be applied on account of the American instalments; which, to an equal amount, should be converted into a fund to satisfy the awards in favor of American claimants. After taking time to consider this communication, it appeared to me to offer the means of bringing the business to a conclusion. Taken together, it amounted to this proposition: that they would accept six hundred thousand pounds, payable by instalments, in lieu of the sixth article, in the execution of which they had a majority of voices, and consent to the execution of the seventh article, according to its provisions, in which we have a majority of voices; provided, the payments to be made by them should be at the same times as those to be made by us. The two commissions having been considered as reciprocal checks upon each other, in the hands of the respective Governments, the converse of this arrangement will test its merits, and determine whether we ought to have rejected it. I thought not: but I disliked the mode in which the end aimed at was to be attained; and, therefore, prepared an article which, by making the awards payable by instalments to the claimants, should attain the same end in a more convenient manner. The sum of the awards would be greater or less than six hundred thousand pounds, for it was not likely to be precisely that sum; if less, a balance must still be remitted from America; if more, in every instalment of every award, the American claimant would have to receive part of his instalment in America, and the balance in England. Besides the trouble of the accounts which must be kept upon this plan, it would create considerable inconvenience, and perhaps injustice; for all the American claimants had been called upon to execute powers of attorney, and appoint agents to conduct their claims in England; and with much trouble, and some expense, had complied with this demand. These claimants, in some cases had deceased; in others, become insolvent; and, in not a few instances, (including, perhaps, cases of insolvency) having anticipated the awards in their favor, had authorized their attorneys to reimburse their advances out of the moneys which might come into their hands from the awards; besides, the plan contained no provision in respect to awards in favor of British subjects.

Upon stating these objections to the Lord Chancellor, he expressed his preference of the article which I had prepared, and which was finally adopted. Another objection, which it was not necessary for me to mention to the Chancellor, had its influence upon my mind: I mean the appearance which this arrangement would have produced, that the two countries had mutually released each other, and agreed to pay their own sufferers: an appearance that might have encouraged the sufferers by French depredations to call upon Congress to indemnify their losses. What Congress would be inclined to do, upon such application, it is, in every respect, unfit for me to conjecture; though, in forming a contract in behalf of the public, it was my duty to take care that its deliberations should not be embarrassed by even the appearance of a precedent, should the supposed case arise.

I take the liberty of adding a word or two to my former communications concerning the second article. What is to be deemed a bonâ fide debt in the last clause of that article will not depend upon a reference to what was once so, but is a judicial question within the competence of our tribunals to determine, and which must consequently be decided by those general and acknowledged principles by which their decisions are, in similar cases, uniformly governed. If I be not mistaken, it is here understood and expected that the affair of the old debts is finally settled as between the two Governments; and, with that share of prudence which it behoves the tribunals of every country to observe in questions affected by national stipulations, I am persuaded that we shall hear no more of them.

Having for many years thought the settlement now accomplished to be a measure of national importance, and one that had, in some degree, become indispensable to do away prejudices which interested and disappointed men had raised against our public faith, I may, I hope, be permitted to observe, that I have pursued the negotiation with zeal and perseverance, notwithstanding the mass of misrepresentation, prejudice, and error with which it has been encumbered. I have done so in circumstances often discouraging, and, sometimes, apparently desperate; cheering myself always with the reflection, which I have somewhere met with, that it is the duty of every one interested with what concerns the welfare of his country, in the midst of despair, to perform all the offices of hope. How far what is done has been well done, remains to be determined. If the President and Senate approve, I shall have nothing to regret.

With sincere regard and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Lord Chancellor.

[Referred to in Mr. King's despatch of 11th January, 1802.]

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, November 22, 1801.

MY LORD:

With the view of explaining the origin and progress of the discussion in which I have now for upwards of two years been engaged, on the subject of the sixth article of our treaty of 1794, I have drawn up the enclosed paper, which I ask the favor of your lordship to peruse.

I wished to have made it shorter, but could not, without omitting what appeared to be material to the elucidation aimed at. If I be not altogether mistaken, the point upon which the business continues to be delayed will appear to your lordship, from the perusal of this paper, in a light somewhat different from that in which you have before seen it; and I am willing to hope that it may have some influence in bringing the affair to a satisfactory conclusion.

With perfect consideration and respect, I have the honor to be,

RUFUS KING.

Lord ELDON, &c.

[Memoir enclosed in the preceding note to the Lord Chancellor.]

It seems unnecessary to repeat, in a particular manner, what has been so fully stated in the discussion that has taken place, concerning the suspension of the two commissioners charged with the execution of the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain. It may, nevertheless, be expedient, concisely to recapitulate the purport of what has passed upon this subject; and, in doing so, to take notice of the origin, the progress, and the present situation of this discussion. This recapitulation will serve the two-fold purpose of explaining the past conduct of the two Governments, and of justifying the opinion that the execution of the seventh article must, as a matter of course, follow the signature of the convention respecting the sixth article.

The commissioners under the sixth article were to receive and decide British claims upon the American Government; and,

The commissioners under the seventh article were, in like manner, to receive and decide American claims upon the British Government: the former met in Philadelphia, the latter in London.

The claims, on the side of Great Britain, arose out of debts due from American citizens to British subjects antecedent to the American war, and the recovery whereof had been prevented, as was alleged, by lawful impediments in the course of judicial proceedings.

The claims, on the side of America, arose out of the illegal capture and condemnation of American ships and cargoes, between the years 1792 and 1796, and for which the claimants, from various causes, were unable to obtain compensation in the ordinary course of justice.

The British claims were founded upon the ancient commercial dealings between America and Great Britain when united, and involved questions arising out of partnerships, insolvencies, and marriage settlements; questions with executors and administrators on both sides; questions upon the sequestation and confiscation laws of the several American States, as well as upon the attainders and criminal process of those States; together with others growing out of the separation which took place between the two countries.

The American claims were few in number, supported by exact proof, and involving few, if any, contested principles of law.

Soon after the commission in Philadelphia assembled, it was apprehended, from the difference in opinion which manifested itself in regard to the matters submitted to its decision, that this difference might increase, and become so considerable, as to disturb the harmony of its proceedings, if not defeat the object of its appointment.

Difficulties of less importance, but which were, nevertheless, viewed with mutual concern, early manifested themselves in the proceedings of the commission assembled in London. By prudence and moderation on all sides, the difficulties were happily surmounted; and this commission, after deciding almost every contested point, was in a train of bringing the business with which it was charged to a satisfactory conclusion, when the disagreements among the commissioners in America rose to a height that made it necessary that their meetings should be suspended.

As soon as the American Government received information of the interruption of the proceedings of the commission at Philadelphia, it sent instructions to its minister in London to enter into immediate and amicable explanations upon the subject with the British Government; and, pursuant to the express provision of the treaty of 1794, to propose an additional article to that treaty, which should secure the rights of the subjects of Great Britain, and, at the same time, protect the American Government from claims not within the purview of the treaty, and which were entitled to and might be satisfied in a different manner.

On the other hand, the British Government, on being apprized of the situation of commission in Philadelphia, represented to the American minister that it would be expedient to suspend the commission in London, until a settlement should be made concerning that in Philadelphia, and a letter, for this purpose, was written by Lord Grenville to the British members of the commission in London, by which they were instructed to decline assisting in the meetings of their Board until they should receive further orders.

In February, 1800, the American minister communicated to the British Government the instructions which he had received, and delivered the project of an explanatory article drawn up in conformity with them.

In April following, the British Government delivered to the American minister a note, in which it rejected the proposed explanatory article, and declined entering into any negotiation upon the subject; referring itself to what had already been stipulated, in the treaty of 1794, upon this subject, and claiming the execution of the sixth article of that treaty according to its provisions. In a subsequent conference, however, between Lord Grenville and the American minister, the former proposed (stating that he did so by the advice of his colleagues,) the abolition of the commission in Philadelphia; provided the United States would pay to Great Britain a definite sum of money, in satisfaction of the whole claim of British subjects, as well upon the American Government as upon individual American citizens; and, estimating this claim at two millions sterling, his lordship offered to accept a sum of between one and two millions, or a million and a half.

As the American minister had no power to accept this offer, he explicitly said so; adding, that he would, as he immediately did, transmit the offer to his Government, together with the refusal of the British Government to accept the explanatory article he had been ordered to propose.

In November following, the American minister received fresh instructions, by which he was ordered to represent to the British Government the earnest desire of the American Government to do whatever depended upon it to carry into full and complete effect the engagements contained in the treaty of 1794; and, in a more particular manner, scrupulously to execute the sixth article of that treaty; and, to call upon the British Government to revise their former decision, and to agree in such explanatory regulations, touching the execution of that article, as had become indispensably necessary to carry it into effect; and, in case the British Government should persist in its refusal upon this head, that he should then propose a modification of the proposition made by the British Government, and offer, on the part of the United States, to pay to the British Government a definite sum of money in satisfaction and discharge of the claims of British subjects upon the American Government, under the sixth article of the treaty of 1794: it being understood that this article should be abolished, and that the British creditors should be free to pursue the recovery of their debts according to the provisions of the fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace concluded in 1783. The purport of this instruction was, without delay, communicated to the British Government; which still adhered to its former decision respecting an explanatory article, but entered into a conference with the American minister, for the purpose of fully comprehending the modification of its own proposition for converting the British claims into a definite sum of money. After the fullest and most exact explanations upon this head, Lord Grenville inquired of the American minister whether he had authority, in like manner, to agree to convert the American claims into a definite sum of money, and abolish the seventh article of the treaty of 1794. To this inquiry the American minister answered that no proposal for this purpose had been made when the British Government first offered to accept a sum of money in satisfaction of the British claims, and abolish the sixth article; that, it not having been proposed, the American Government had given him neither instructions nor power concerning such commutation; and, had it even done so, such was the nature of the American claims, that the commutation would be inexpedient and unnecessary.

After taking time to consider this proposal, the British Government admitted it as a basis of a negotiation which it commenced with the American minister, for the purpose of converting the British claims under the sixth article into a definite sum, and abolishing the article, leaving the seventh article to be executed according to its provisions.

A long and full discussion ensued upon this subject; and, in August of the present year, the British Government informed the American minister that it had agreed to accept the sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, which he had been authorized to offer in satisfaction and discharge of the British claims under the sixth article; and to abolish that article, provided the terms of payment could be satisfactorily settled, and provision made that the British creditors should, in future, meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of their debts. On this occasion, the American minister explicitly stated his expectation that a settlement of the claims under the sixth article would be followed by the removal of the impediment which stood in the way of the execution of the seventh article; and, no objection being made, he added that he would charge himself with recalling to London the commissioners under the seventh article, who were at that time dispersed. Various conferences afterwards took place in order to settle the instalments, and agree upon the provision respecting the judicial remedy of the British creditors; and, after exchanging projects and altering articles upon these points, the draft of a convention was finally settled and mutually approved, and the American minister was invited to attend on the following day for the purpose of signing it. On this occasion, he repeated what had been before stated, and what, not only the basis and tenor of the negotiation, but the terms of the convention which had been agreed upon, authorized that it was his expectation that every impediment to the execution of the seventh article would be removed upon the signature of the convention concerning the sixth article.

It is not necessary to explain the objection which most unexpectedly prevented the conclusion of this business, especially as it is believed to have proceeded from the want of a full acquaintance with what had before passed upon the subject. But it is impossible not to remark that, while the business remains open, not only individuals will continue to suffer inconveniences, but the respective Governments will, ere long, participate of their impatience; and this, too, at a time in many respects critical, and when, moreover, the commercial treaty between them is about to expire, and new and temperate discussions will be necessary to revise and re-establish it. A treaty, not merely nominal, or applying to inconsiderable interests, but which may regulate and confirm commercial dealings more extensive and valuable than are carried on between any other two nations, and the advantages of which, if undisturbed, will annually exceed any conjectural difference that may be supposed to exist with regard to the settlement so steadily and earnestly desired by America.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, January 15, 1802.

SIR:

As the object and words of the second article of the convention will be sought for, and examined, with care and attention, it occurs to me, upon the revision of my former communications, to suggest a single observation to those heretofore made. If the second article of the convention had been entirely omitted, the fourth article of the treaty of peace would have remained in full force and operation; the adoption of the second article of the convention limits its force and operation to subjects upon which it legally can, and ought hereafter to operate; thereby excluding all those upon which it once might have so operated, but upon which, from various causes, it can and ought not in future to operate. This reflection, pursued in its detail, will place the article in its true light.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

APRIL 8, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In order to satisfy, as far as in my power, the desire expressed in your resolution of the 6th instant,* I now transmit you a letter from John Read, agent for the United States, before the Board of Commissioners under the sixth article of the treaty with Great Britain, to the Atorney General, bearing date the 25th of April, 1801, in which he gives a summary view of the proceedings of those commissioners, and of the principles established or insisted on by a majority of them.

Supposing it might be practicable for us to settle, by negotiation, with Great Britain the principles which ought to govern the decisions under the treaty, I caused instructions to be given to Mr. Read to analyze the claims before the Board of Commissioners, to class them under the principles on which they respectively depended, and to state the sum depending on each principle, or the amount of each description of debt. The object of this was that we might know what principles were most important for us to contend for, and what others might be conceded without much injury. He performed this duty, and gave in such a statement during the last summer; but the chief clerk of the Secretary of State's office being absent on account of sickness, and the only person acquainted with the arrangement of the papers of the office, this particular document cannot at this time be found. Having, however, been myself in possession of it a few days after its receipt, I then transcribed from it, for my own use, the recapitulation of the amount of each description of debt. A copy of this transcript I shall subjoin hereto, with assurances that it is substantially correct, and with the hope that it will give a view of the subject sufficiently precise to fulfil the wishes of the Senate, to save them the delay of waiting till a copy of the agent's letter could be made. I send the original, with the request that it may be returned at the convenience of the Senate.

APRIL 17, 1802.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I now transmit you a report of the Secretary of State, with the document accompanying it, on the subject of your resolution of the 12th instant, concerning the seventh article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 16, 1802.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred, by the President of the United States, a resolution of the Senate, passed on the 12th day of this month, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the Senate the amount of claims preferred under the seventh article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with Great Britain, and of the sums awarded by the commissioners, and paid by the British Government, and a statement of the principles adopted by the said commissioners in their proceedings under the said article, thereupon respectfully submits the following report to the President:

That, agreeably to an estimate made on the 9th of May, 1798, by Samuel Cabot, Esq., at that time an agent of the United States, under the seventh article of the said treaty, the claims preferred under that article amounted to the sum of one million two hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling. The document herewith submitted to the President, containing a general statement of moneys received on awards of the commissioners, will show the sums awarded by them, and paid by the British Government, under the article in question of the said treaty.

It does not appear, from any researches which the Secretary has been able to make, that the precise principles on which the commissioners have proceeded, can be otherwise deduced than from the awards made in the several cases which have been decided. Any statement of them in detail is presumed not to be within the intention of the resolution.

All which is respectfully submitted:

JAMES MADISON.

* This resolution is in these words: "Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate the amount and description of claims preferred under the sixth article of the British treaty, and which would have been chargeable to the United States if the principles contended for by the British commissioners had been established as the rules of decision by which those claims should be determined.

It would appear that, of the whole forty cases, decided as above, public advances have been made only in nine; upon each of those cases it is probable there were also several expenses paid by the claimants: these, as well as what was paid in the remaining thirty-one cases, as also in seventeen which were dismissed by the Board, it is impossible to ascertain.

GEORGE W. EWING, Agent.

LONDON, December 1, 1801.

It appeared, by the statement of my predecessor, that only seventeen cases were dismissed by the Board; but, by a particular examination of documents furnished me by the clerk of the Board, I find that there were, in fact, thirty-one cases dismissed.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 15, 1802.

APRIL 15, 1802.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit the papers desired in your resolution of the 6th instant. Those respecting the Berceau will sufficiently explain themselves. The officer charged with her repairs states, in his letter received August 27th, 1801, that he had been led, by circumstances, which he explains, to go considerably beyond his orders. In questions between nations, who have no common umpire but reason, something must often be yielded of mutual opinion, to enable them to meet in a common point.

The allowance which had been proposed to the officers of that vessel being represented as too small for their daily necessities, and still more so as the means of paying, before their departure, debts contracted with our citizens for subsistence, it was requested, on their behalf, that the daily pay of each might be the measure of their allowance. This being solicited, and reimbursement assured by the agent of their nation, I deemed that the indulgence would have a propitious effect in the moment of returning friendship. The sum of eight hundred and seventy dollars and eighty-three cents was accordingly furnished them for the five months of past captivity, and a proportional allowance authorized until their embarkation.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Extract of a letter from Messrs. Stephen Higginson and Co. to the Secretary of the Navy.

"NOVEMBER 19, 1800.

"Captain Little wishes to have his prisoners landed, and his prize cleared of them, and Captain Gates thinks he can make out to receive and guard them on Castle Island, having a guard of marines from the Boston and Herald; and this mode we shall probably adopt to-morrow, to serve till we receive your orders."

From the same to the same.

DECEMBER 5, 1800.

"The prisoners from Le Berceau are now all landed on Castle island, and have very comfortable accommodations. We have furnished them with clothing and fire-wood, and they are now so well fixed and guarded, that it is perhaps best that they should remain there, and not be sent into the interior. We have paroled the officers of that ship, and they are in town, under obligation to remain here until the trial of their ship. Many complaints are made to us by these poor fellows. We afford them all the accommodation in our power, and go all the lengths our orders will admit."

From the same to the same.

DECEMBER 12, 1800.

"Our district court has condemned the prize ship Le Berceau and her apparel; and the marshal has advertised her for sale by auction, the first of next month. She yet remains below. We have not seen her; but Captain Talbot thinks her a very good cruiser, well constructed, and with excellent cover. The French officers believe that, when in trim, she is equal to the Boston in sailing; and had she not been too deep, they say she would have escaped. She is seven years old, was built at L'Orient in the best manner, and was esteemed the best corvette ever seen there. Her copper is worn out, her sails and rigging cut to pieces, her masts all gone, and she appears a wreck, but her hull is very good. She has an abundance of maritime stores; a new suit of sails below; part of her rigging may again answer; perhaps some of the old sails, &c."

The Secretary of the Navy to S. Higginson and Co.

DECEMBER 19, 1800.

"I have the honor to request that you will cause the French ship Le Berceau to be purchased for the United States, and afterwards have her placed where she will be secure, with just as many men on board as will be necessary to take care of her. Make no repairs.

"The British Government generally buy the national ships captured by their own, but at very low prices. Be pleased so to conduct the purchase now directed, as to prevent its being known that it is on account of Government. Then gentlemen, who might feel delicacy in interfering with the views of Government, will not be restrained from bidding, nor will others bid merely to swell the price for the benefit of the captors.

"I have the honor, &c."

Extracts of a letter from Messrs. S. Higginson and Co. to the Secretary of the Navy.

DECEMBER 22, 1800.

"Dr. Welsh, the physician to the marine hospital, has taken care of the French prisoners when sick, and now wishes to have his account settled, and inquires in what form he shall make it out. He proposes charging the same as he is allowed for the garrison, which will be reasonable enough, as the average number of the prisoners is equal, at least, to that of the garrison, and probably more of them have been under his care, from their confinement on board ships, and in the prison."

"The marshal has concluded to defer the sale of the Boston's prize Le Berceau beyond the time set, the first of next month, to afford time to receive any orders you shall please to forward respecting her."

From the same to the same.

JANUARY 16, 1801.

"Yesterday the prize ship Le Berceau was sold at auction; the ship and apparel were sold first at eight thousand dollars; afterwards her guns and maritime stores, &c. in different lots. We employed a person to buy in the whole for Government, in a manner that gave a fair chance to make the most of her. The amount we yet know not, as the marshal has not made out the account; probably about twelve thousand in all."

The Secretary of the Navy to Messrs. S. Higginson and Co.

SIR: BOSTON, Feb. 17, 1801.

I have the honor to request that you will deliver to the order of Mr. Letombe all the French prisoners in your custody. You will take a receipt for them, which, with a list of their names, you will be pleased to enclose to me. If any have been released upon their parole of honor, I request that you will discharge them from the obligations of their parole.

I have the honor, &c.

The Secretary of the Navy to Mr. Letombe.

SIR: FEBRUARY 17, 1801.

I have the honor to inform you that I have directed Messrs. S. Higginson and Co., Boston; Mr. William Peck, marshal of Rhode Island; Philip B. Bradley, Esq. marshal of Connecticut; Aquila Giles, Esq. marshal of New York; Montjoy Bailey, Esq. Fredericktown, Maryland; and William Crafts, Esq. Charleston, South Carolina, to deliver to your order the French prisoners in their custody.

There are one hundred and fifty at Boston; twenty-five at Providence, R. I.; one hundred in Connecticut; eight blacks at New York; ninety do. Fredericktown; eight Charleston, South Carolina.

I request that you will, as speedily as possible, make your arrangements to remove them from the United States.

I have the honor, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Letombe, Commercial Agent of France, to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, 10*th Ventose*, (1*st March*, 1801, O. S.)
9*th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.*

"Citizen Clement (commander of the Berceau) and his companions in misfortune, wish to return to France by the cartel Olive, which you have furnished with a passport. But every thing has been taken from them; they are without money or clothes, and they are indebted in Boston for their daily subsistence, having received nothing for this purpose from the Government of the United States. Under these circumstances, as it is impossible for the agents of the republic to procure for them money, (those agents, besides, not being qualified to act as commissaries of prisoners,) and no funds having been provided for this purpose from France; so that the money to be furnished them for their subsistence in quality of prisoners can come from no quarter but from the Government of the United States, to which, in reason, that of France is holden for the reimbursement; the situation of these officers is truly deplorable.

Copy of a letter from Levi Lincoln, Esq., acting as Secretary of State, to Mr. Letombe, late Consul General of France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, CITY OF WASHINGTON, March 10th, 1801.

SIR:

I received yours of the 1st inst. The enclosed letter from the Navy Department is designed, in some degree, to meet the evils complained of. You will be pleased to seal and forward it. The necessary passports shall be furnished as soon as a vessel shall be engaged and freighted, and shall give the necessary information for that purpose to the office.

The port from which each vessel sails must be specified, the name of her master, her own name, and the port of her destination. I will request Mr. Thornton to supply you with such passports as you may apply for, who will be in Philadelphia at the time you may probably need them. Measures have been and are now taking to correct and remove every just cause of complaint to the French prisoners. If a loan of moneys should become necessary, it may be the subject of further consideration.

Be assured, sir, the American Government will never stop short of the last reasonable exertion to secure justice, and the benefits of humane arrangements to the unfortunate.

The Secretary of the Navy to Messrs. S. Higginson and Co.

MARCH 10, 1801.

You have already been instructed to deliver to the order of Mr. Letombe all the French prisoners under your care. Before the delivery, you will furnish each person with such cheap cloathing as shall be sufficient, with what he has, to make him comfortable. Some of the officers, who have been kept in the country on parole, represent that they have received no allowance from the Government of the United States for their subsistence, and that they are distressed to pay the debts incurred for their maintenance. You will be pleased, in every such case, to pay to each officer a sum of money equal to two dollars per week, for the whole time he has lived at his own expense.

As soon as the prisoners are delivered, you will forward to the accountant of this Department your whole account for expenses of French prisoners.

I have the honor, &c.

The Secretary of the Navy to Messrs. S. Higginson and Co.

MARCH 14, 1801.

I request that you will, without delay, send to New York all the French prisoners under your care.

You will be pleased to supply them with provisions, and give a preference to the cheapest mode of conveyance: the expenses of which you will bring into your account against the United States, for maintenance, &c. of French prisoners.

I have the honor, &c.

The Chargé des Affaires of the French republic to the Secretary of State.

MARCH 19, 1801.

The undersigned chargé des affaires of the French republic has the honor to request the Secretary of State that he will be pleased to make known to the President of the United States the following facts and reflections, relating to the convention signed at Paris the 19th Vendemiaire, (30th November last,) by the ministers plenipotentiary of the two states. The object of this convention having been to do away a misunderstanding, unhappily too long continued, and equally opposed to the interests of both states, the First Consul of the republic, who had nothing so much at heart as to remove all remembrance of differences which had occurred previous to his administration, did not wait till he could be informed that the Federal Government would adhere to this treaty, before he performed those stipulations which were to have effect from the date of the signing of the treaty. It is in consequence of this eagerness, and of the entire confidence which he placed in the good faith of the Government of the United States, that he has caused to be given to the council of prizes directions respecting American cases depending before that council, conformable rather to the spirit than to the letter of this treaty; and has sent to all the establishments of the republic, beyond sea, instructions calculated, not only to ensure full justice for the past, in a manner consonant to the obligations of the convention, but also to prevent, in future, unauthorized measures towards the commerce and navigation of the United States, either on the part of the administration or of individuals.

The undersigned, in order to justify what he advances, has the honor to lay before the Secretary of State: 1st. A statement of decisions made upon American prizes since the signing of the convention, from which it appears that, since that period, one vesssel only has been condemned, and that a vessel demonstrated, by the papers on board, to belong to the enemy: 2. Two extracts, at length, from the despatches addressed by the Minister of the Marine, and sent immediately upon the signing of the treaty, by avisos, (advice boats,) to all the administrations of the French colonies, including the isles of France and Reunion. No remarks will be added to these extracts. They prove, by the strictness which prevails in them, that the Government of the republic, so far from encouraging the measures which have wound up the irritation of one of the two parties to the point to which it has actually been carried, these measures have been most frequently flagrant violations of the laws and instructions of the Government—violations which the distance of place and other circumstances have not always permitted to be known, or to be repressed. The French Government has not even waited till the signing should be completed, to take such of the measures mentioned above as related to those affairs which were transacting near at home. As soon as there was reason to hope for an accommodation, all proceedings in American matters were suspended, for the purpose of preventing final condemnations. And the correspondence of the American negotiators will prove that those of the republic were eager to support the demands which the former made to this effect. The undersigned will add that, in order to obviate all delays or difficulties which might have been produced by interests contrary to the spirit of the convention, the Minister of Foreign Relations, in consequence of an authorization of the First Consul, enjoined it upon the council of prizes to adjourn, for an indefinite period, all decisions upon the question of property captured under the American flag. The subjoined extracts of a letter from the minister will explain, better than the undersigned can do it, the motives which have given rise to this measure, and how much its object is to ensure the full execution of the treaty.

After having shown what has been the conduct of the Government of the republic, it remains for the undersigned to request that the Secretary of State will be pleased to inform him of the intentions of the President of the United States respecting the execution of that part of the convention which relates to the obligations of the said States, in order that he may acquaint his Government with the same.

The undersigned does not suppose that the modifications which the convention has undergone in its ratifications, by the United States, can prevent the Federal Government from proceeding in the execution, on its part, without waiting for the exchange of the respective ratifications. These modifications can, on no ground, form an obstacle, unless an apprehension is entertained that, by them, the ratification of the First Consul may be rendered uncertain. Although the undersigned is, in this respect, without instructions, he does not hesitate to say that this apprehension appears unfounded. The immediate approbation, and the anticipated execution which the First Magistrate has given to this act, sufficiently prove the opinion which he entertains of it, and there is no probability that this opinion will be changed. The undersigned, at least, ventures to presume that it will not be changed by alterations which have no otherеffect (if the undersigned is rightly informed) than to render the principle of the treaty more and more sacred—a principle of which the object is to remove pretensions of the respective parties, the discussion of which might have thrown serious difficulties in the way of the negotiation, and have rendered the issue of it questionable.

Agreeably to the preceding remarks, which will appear, without doubt, plausible to the Secretary of State, the undersigned presumes that the conditional ratification of the Senate having left all the articles subsisting, which stipulate reciprocal restitutions, the President will have taken the proper measures for preventing condemnations of French property, contrary to the fourth article, or, at least, that where those condemnations shall have taken place, or shall continue in the federal courts, he will assure to the aggrieved parties the indemnities contemplated by that article. The undersigned, being authorized by his Government to take into his possession the property of individuals not claimed by them, which may be restored, in virtue of this stipulation, finds, in this authorization, a new motive for desiring to know both the measures and the disposition of the Federal Government upon this point. He will add, that if he is induced, for the sake of those who are interested on the part of the French, to wish that the exchange of the ratifications may be anticipated in making these restitutions, this anticipation will be no more than to reciprocate what the French Government has done, even when the ratification of the United States could not have been foreseen by it.

An article to which it is natural to suppose that the French Government attaches importance is, that which concerns the restitution of vessels of war. The undersigned will say nothing of the considerations which rendered it desirable that this restitution should take place. It is sufficient to call to mind that many French vessels of war, of different forces, have been taken by the vessels of the United States. The undersigned desires to know the intention of the Government of the United States, as well respecting those of the vessels in question which are on foreign stations, as those which are now in American ports, in order that he may take his measures accordingly. As to the last, of which the undersigned will be in a situation to take immediate possession, he imagines that the Government of the United States will consider themselves bound to restore them in the state they were in at the time of their capture. From the information collected by the undersigned, it appears that the frigate L'Insurgente is lost. There is reason to believe that it will appear just to the President to replace this frigate, or to pay the value of it to the republic. The spirit of the treaty, at least, and the principles of law, seem, at the first view, to justify this hope; and the undersigned imagines that, in this case, it would be easy to come to an understanding as to which of the modes would be entitled to the preference.

It only remains for the undersigned, before concluding this note, to speak of the reciprocal communications of the two people, and of the measures taken upon one side and the other, to remove the obstacles which had, for a moment, interrupted it. The First Consul, immediately on the signing of the treaty, gave orders in all the ports of the republic to remove the prohibitions which the reprisals had occasioned against American vessels. The copies transmitted with this note, by the undersigned, sufficiently prove that all prohibitions in our colonies, if any ever existed, had been, or ought to have been, long since removed. If the Government of the United States, as there is reason to believe, have, upon their part, put an end to theirs, it is to be hoped that the customary relations will shortly be re-established. Although the respective obligations, in this particular, ought not, in strictness, to commence until after the exchange of the ratifications, there is, however, reason to believe that the Federal Government, upon this point, as well as upon others, will have felt the same anxious desire as the First Consul to re-establish the ordinary connexions of friendship and of commerce.

The undersigned hopes that, agreeably to these sentiments, the President of the United States will have seen fit to take measures for putting an end to the unfriendly proceedings (to say no more) which have taken place in the French colonies, with the sanction of the American Government. A detail will not be attempted of the facts relating to the conduct of the naval forces of the United States, in regard to some of these colonies. Neither will the conduct be adverted to, which the accredited agents of the American Government may have pursued, and the insinuations which they may have carried into some others of those colonies. All these acts ought to be forgotten: and there are grounds for presuming that the Federal Government has been forward to render, upon this point, the justice which that of the republic required at an early period, by a letter from the Minister of Foreign Relations, addressed to the American plenipotentiaries at the moment of their departure. The friendly dispositions, of which the undersigned, since his arrival, has received unequivocal proofs, assure him, if any thing remained to be done in this particular, conformable to the spirit of the treaty, and to the satisfactions which the respective dignities of the two states may require, that the President of the United States would hasten to take measures which should not leave the United States behind the French republic in striving for the perfect re-establishment of the good understanding between them.

The undersigned has the honor to pray the Secretary of State to be pleased to accept the assurances of his perfect consideration.

Extract of a letter from the Minister of the Marine and of the Colonies to the agents of the French Government in the Colonies.

PARIS, 21 Vendemiaire, year 9. (October 12, 1800.)

A convention, citizens, which re-establishes between the French republic and the United States of America the ordinary relations of friendship and of commerce, has been signed at Paris, the 8th of this month, by the ministers plenipotentiary of the two Powers. It immediately received the approbation of the First Consul, and it is about to be submitted for the ratification of the American Government.

Two articles of this convention, the fourth and seventeenth, are already obligatory upon the two contracting nations, according to the precise letter of those articles; and you will find annexed copies of these two articles, to which I enjoin you to conform with the greatest punctuality.

The fourth article settles the conditions upon which restitutions are to be reciprocally made, of property captured, and not finally condemned, or which may be captured before the exchange of the ratifications. It is there expressly stipulated that, if property has been condemned contrary to the spirit of the convention, it shall be restored or paid for immediately; and this article is executory from this moment.

Thus it would be upon the public treasure, upon your fellow-citizens themselves, that the fault which you may commit will fall, if you permit an infraction of this convention to be made, or a judgment to be executed, which it would disallow. But I do not admit the possibility of such an impropriety in your conduct. You become this day responsible for the execution of the stipulations which have been concluded between France and the United States; and this responsibility will not be illusory. The Government will not, with impunity, suffer an indemnity to be borne by the republic, to the payment of which you shall either negligently or knowingly have contributed.

The seventeenth article establishes the rules which the two Powers mutually acknowledge, in relation to the navigation of their respective vessels, when one shall be engaged in war, and the other remains neuter. This article comprehends, in a great measure, the provisions of the fourth, and fixes (to use the expression) the legislation common to both nations, so far as respects maritime prizes, and will, consequently, be the rule of your conduct from this day forward.

The friendly relations which existed between the republic and the United States being re-established, it is useless to seek for the causes which have produced a momentary misunderstanding, the consequences of which have been unhappy for both parties. The same sentiments, the same motives, which for a long time united them, have again brought them together, and the inhabitants of the colonies will share the satisfaction which has been felt, in consequence of this reconciliation in the mother country. She is, in effect, about to open for these countries new outlets for the produce of the soil and of industry, to bring back a competition equally favorable to the consumers, and to the progress of cultivation. She will, above all, efface all traces of those transactions which, either executed, or only projected in some colonies, have presented the criminal example of an entire forgetfulness of all patriotic principles, and of a disposition marked with ingratitude and infidelity towards the mother country. This convention also puts an end to all pretexts for those hostile measures which the administrations of many French possessions beyond sea have permitted against the American navigation. It goes, in short, to restore immediately the ancient connexions which existed between the two Governments, by means of commissaries of commercial relations. I recommend to you particularly to maintain a regular correspondence with the Commissary General appointed for the United States, as well upon those objects which relate to the convention of 8th Vendemiaire, as upon the attempts which our enemies may make to engage this Power with them, or to introduce themselves fraudulently through the assistance which they may derive from similarity of language, manners, and mode of ship-building. The American Government, informed by this agent of the fears and suspicions which you may have reason to entertain, will apply itself, without doubt, to remove the causes which produced them; and you will easily perceive that the confidence which induces such measures is suggested by the reconciliation which has been effected between the two nations.

The loyalty of the French, the faith due to treaties, and the interest of the republic, unite them to require it as a duty from all the agents of the Government, to prevent, by their vigilance, their integrity, and their firmness, every thing by which the state of peace might be disturbed.

One of the surest means for attaining this end is to keep the strictest watch over vessels fitted out for cruising, and to require from those fitting them out a rigid observance of the laws and regulations.

There may be no occasion for me to awaken your attention upon this subject; but multiplied facts, and those too of a recent date, force me to believe that the privateers in our colonies are guilty, with impunity, of the most shameful robberies.

Instead of attacking the real enemies of France, against whom it would be glorious and useful to engage, the privateers employ the whole time of their cruise in interrupting the trade of allies and of neutrals. But I will not conceal from you, citizens, that the charges which I have mentioned against the privateers are daily made by the agents of every foreign Power, and are often made even by those of our citizens who have been compelled by circumstances to make use of a neutral flag, and pointed at the superior administrations of the colonies.

They are accused of openly suffering these abuses; of permitting weak and feebly armed privateers to take the sea, better fitted for pillage than for combat; of not requiring from every person fitting out a privateer the bail which the law of 23d Thermidor, third year, with so much reason, requires as a security for indemnification to the navigator illegally captured; and of declaring to be valid prizes taken in contempt of the law of nations, of treaties, and of our own laws and regulations.

You will perceive what suspicions are excited against the public functionaries, who are the objects of such charges as these. Your delicacy, then, as well as your duty, will incite you to prevent complaints of this nature; and if, as I cannot yet bring myself to believe, they are substantially founded, you are so much the more blameable, as you will not only have acted contrary to the laws and interests of your country, but will also have disregarded the instructions which you have received.

A great part of the complaints which I now transmit to you might have been prevented, if the administrators of the colonies had taken care that no privateers should be fitted out, but such as were in a condition to resist the enemy. The expense itself of such vessels would have been, in some measure, a security for the solvency of the owner, and of course for his conduct towards the vessels of allies and of neutrals; and besides, an honest and prudent merchant of easy circumstances would never expose himself to the dangers which he would incur by an illegal, or even by a hazardous capture.

I prescribe it to you, therefore, as a rule, not to suffer any vessel to be fitted out with arms, the capacity of which is not sufficient to take on board at least three months' provisions, and which does not carry at least sixteen guns, if four pounders, or twelve six pounders.

Extract of a letter from the Minister of Foreign Relations to Citizen Pichon.

PARIS, 14 Nivose, year 9, (January 3, 1801.)

I have this very day written to the council of prizes, requesting them to adjourn to an indefinite period all decisions upon every kind of property seized under the flag of the United States.

If this adjournment excites any inquietude in the United States, you will say that, far from being intended to defer restitutions, it is, on the contrary, calculated to render them both more prompt and more certain.

As soon as the convention shall be ratified upon both sides, I will urge forward a decree of the consuls, which shall replevy for the Americans all the prizes, the restitution of which has been engaged for. This step, in the first place, is the only one consistent with principle. It is, moreover, the most advantageous for the Americans, since it does away the intervention of the council of prizes, which could proceed only partially in the restitutions; and will save them from the unavoidable delays in its proceedings.

The Secretary of the Navy to S. Higginson and Co.

MARCH 20, 1801.

The French national ship the Berceau, captured by Captain Little, is to be restored under the treaty.

You will please to cause her to be delivered, with all her guns, ammunition, apparel, and every thing belonging to her, to the order of Mr. Pichon, commissary general and chargé des affaires from the French Government to the Government of the United States, whenever such orders shall appear.

This business should be done as if no reluctance accompanied the restoration. We are now at peace with France, and we should act as if we returned to a state of amity with pleasure. Let there be no cause of complaint against the Government or its agents.

I have the honor, &c.

The Secretary of the Navy to Messrs. S. Higginson and Co.

MARCH 20, 1801.

Enclosed is an account exhibited by the lieutenant of the Berceau, of the pay due to the officers of that vessel from their Government, from the time of their capture to the 25th Ventose, amounting to four thousand seven hundred and fifty livres.

Instead of allowing them two dollars per week, as you have heretofore been requested, it is the President's desire that you pay to Lieutenant Clements the amount of this account, taking his receipt for the same, which you will send to the Accountant of the Navy as your voucher.

I have the honor, &c.

Extract.—The Secretary of the Navy to Samuel Brown, Esq.

APRIL 1, 1801.

"I have to request that you will be pleased to ascertain, without delay, the state the French national ship Le Berceau was in at the time of her capture, as to her armament, stores, and provisions, and to cause her to be put in the same condition before she is delivered up to the French Government."

To Samuel Brown Esq., Boston.

APRIL 10, 1801.

I have received a letter of the 27th ultimo from Messrs. Higginson and Co. who informed me that they expected to transport all the white French prisoners to New York, and that about seventy blacks would remain in their custody, whom they intended to send to New York as soon as they could provide a vessel to take them round. If their intentions in either or both cases have been frustrated, I request that the prisoners may be retained at Boston, as the whites will be wanted for the Berceau, and the blacks will be sent direct from Boston by Mr. Pichon.

I have the honor, &c.

WASHINGTON CITY, 13 Germinal, 9th year (3*d April*, 1801.)

SIR:

I have learned, since my arrival in the United States, that many of the French prisoners brought in by American vessels of war are still remaining here. No measures having been taken by my Government for facing the wants occasioned by a circumstance entirely unforeseen, I find myself not in a situation to relieve the first necessities of these prisoners. All that I can do is, to procure them a passage back to France or to the colonies. The benevolent dispositions, sir, which you have been pleased to manifest to citizen Letombe, by your letter of the 10th March, encourage me to request you to obtain from the President of the United States the necessary authorizations, by which all the individuals who have been brought here in consequence of the past misunderstanding, and who are delivered up to the agents of the republic, may receive from the United States a daily supply until the time of their departure, which I will take measures to effect without delay. The supplies, sir, shall be placed to the account of the French republic, in whose name I will hasten to liquidate and acknowledge this debt; and also to discharge it by drafts on the national treasury, or by any other means in my power. These measures are not only consistent with the sentiments of conciliation which animate the two Governments, but they are also conformable to the usage which has always prevailed, and which requires that prisoners or other persons detained by a Power should be supported by the Power detaining them.

Be pleased, sir, to accept the assurance of my high consideration.

L. A. PICHON.

To the SECRETARY OF STATE of the United States.

GEORGETOWN, 1*st Floreal, year* 9, (April 21, 1801.)

SIR:

I have had the honor to transmit you the copy of the instructions which the Minister of the Marine sent to the French colonies, to ensure the execution of those articles of the treaty which were obligatory from the time of its being signed, and to prevent a repetition of what had passed in those colonies. I have much pleasure in transmitting to you official proofs of the prompt effect which these orders have produced in Guadaloupe. They are contained in the correspondence of the agents of the consuls of the republic, which has reached me very shortly since, in consequence of the instruction given to all the agents of the republic in the colonies to keep me informed of the measures which they might take in obeying the injunctions of the First Consul. I confine myself to lay before you, among the numerous documents which they have sent me, 1st, Extract of the letter which they have written to me; 2d, A printed copy of the order which they published as soon as they received those of the Government; 3d, Extract of a letter written by these agents to Mr. Murray, commander of the United States' frigate the Constellation, and containing a list of the American vessels which they had released; 4th, lastly, Copy of an order which they have addressed to all their delegates in the colonies of neutrals and allies, as well as to the auctioneers of the island, to obtain a knowledge of the condemnations made since the signing of the treaty, and to prepare the means for obtaining the restitutions directed by the fourth article. I will add, sir, that previously, viz. on 28th Nivose, the agents had enjoined upon their delegates not to deliver to the captors any funds arising from prizes standing in this predicament.

It is, sir, very agreeable to me to have to give you circumstantial and official details of these proceedings, which the President of the United States will have already been acquainted with, from the papers which have been published. I beg you, sir, to submit these documents to him, and to give him the assurance that I shall make it a duty to co-operate to the last moment in perfectly and fully executing the treaty whenever the United States or their citizens shall have claims for restitution to carry forward. You will, without doubt, sir, think it advisable to inform the parties interested of the dispositions of the agents at Guadaloupe, that they may take measures for claiming their property: and, in general, it may perhaps appear to you desirable to inform the public of the eagerness to repair the wrongs occasioned by the misunderstanding which has been, and is shown by the authorities in that colony, where, at first sight, the greatest and most multiplied causes of irritation appear to have been given.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my respect, and of my high consideration.

L. A. PICHON.

"As soon as I was officially informed of the convention before mentioned, and of the circular of the agents of the consuls, I released all the vessels which were unsold, and I took measures for defending the interests of the Americans who might have claims for restitution to establish.

I will, in like manner, make acquainted with your letter the agents of the consuls of the republic at the Windward islands. I have no doubt that the demand of Mr. Watmough will be received with all the favor which it merits. Health and consideration.

SIR:

Dr. Thomas Welsh is to be allowed for his attendance on French prisoners, from June 15, 1799, to April 1, 1801, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, and his account of medicines, say eighty dollars forty-seven cents. Upon his calling upon you, you will be pleased to pay him at that rate.

SIR:

Sixty-nine French prisoners have been sent to New York, and are to be transported from thence to Boston, there to be delivered to such officers as Mr. Pichon may appoint to receive them: they will be directed to you, and I have to request your attention to their delivery.

With much respect, I have the honor, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pichon to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, June 18, 1801.

To return, sir, in effect, to the objects which are the subject of your reply, it only remains for me to pray you to offer to the President of the United States my thanks for the decisions which you have communicated to me from him. As to the sum of fifteen thousand dollars advanced by the United States, to succor the colonists who had fled from St. Domingo, I hesitate so little to acknowledge that the French republic is accountable for it to these States, and am so sure that the principles which govern the First Consul of the republic will lead him to admit this obligation, that I offer, sir, to include it in the liquidation which I am desirous of making as soon as possible, of the claims which the Federal Government has upon that of the republic, for the different advances which it has made for our prisoners since the misunderstanding, and for every other purpose. I have had the honor, sir, of praying you to be pleased to invite the respective departments who have made these advances, to prepare their accounts. As soon as all expenses of this kind shall be closed, I shall think myself sufficiently authorized to settle and adjust them.

Extract of a letter from Samuel Brown, Esq. to the Secretary of the Navy.

BOSTON, June 24, 1801.

"On Monday, the 22d, the corvette Le Berceau was delivered to the commissary of the French Government, and the captain at the same time took charge of her. At the request of the commissary and captain, and from the necessity of the case, I have furnished some articles which may not have been on board at the time of the capture, such as hammocks and blankets; and if then on board, they were retained wholly, or in part, by the crew. The captain now wishes to be furnished with silver spoons, plated ware, china, &c. for his cabin. These I cannot provide without your special directions, as I do not suppose they were on board at the time of the capture. The commissary is willing, on the part of his Government, to engage to pay for all articles supplied that probably were not then on board the corvette.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to S. Brown, Esq.

JULY 3, 1801.

"There is no doubt that the Berceau has been sufficiently repaired and furnished; of course no more expense must be incurred on the part of the United States on her account. It will be proper that you write a letter to this Department, stating, particularly, the repairs and supplies she received at the public expense, and the precise state and condition she was in, as to her equipments of every kind, on her delivery to the officers appointed on the part of the French republic to receive her. The day of the delivery should also be stated."

JULY 8, 1801.

SIR:

I have caused to be examined the transactions relative to the payment of money by order of this Department to the officers of the French corvette Le Berceau, and find that the sum of eight hundred and seventy dollars and eighty-three cents, equal to 4,750 livres, was paid into the hands of Lieutenant Clement by Messrs. S. Higginson and Co., navy agents, at Boston; copy of the pay roll, and Mr. Clement's receipt, is enclosed herewith. This appears to be the only money advanced by the United States to these officers on account of their pay. Other moneys have been, however, advanced to them, on account of subsistence, whilst they were considered as prisoners; the precise amount of which cannot now be ascertained, as the accounts are in an unsettled state.

I have the honor, &c.

2d. What course the President of the United States will follow with regard to the restitution of property under the article of the treaty, it being known that France has actually restored many vessels; whether the Government will be able to procure restitution, or whether it must be subject to legislative co-operation?

3d. Citizen Pichon, as he intimated it, is authorized to take possession of all the property which is to be restored to individuals who are not present, or have no attorneys. The present state of war, and the constant habit of the consular administration of France, which has made consuls guardians of property belonging to absentees, has suggested the measure; and other obvious reasons make it expedient for the administration and individuals both.

4th. In all prizes made by American public vessels, one-half of the capture accruing to the United States, citizen Pichon wishes to know whether even that half of the property is only to be restored by legislative concurrence, or whether the executive can give it up. It would be peculiarly gratifying in the case of the Vengeance, where individuals are yet present, and are soon embarking for France, at which place, from their military situation, it will prove extremely difficult for them to obtain their quota of the restored property.

6th. No answer has been yet made on the case of the Insurgente. Inquiries must have been made at the Navy Department to ascertain some facts which may be elucidated by the discussion of that case.

Extract of a letter from Samuel Brown, Navy Agent at Boston, to the Secretary of the Navy, dated

JULY 13, 1801.

"The fitting out of the corvette Le Berceau has been attended with too much delay. She ought to have been at sea before this time; but it has not been in my power to hasten her departure. I have repeatedly urged the necessity that the expense of subsisting the crew might be extinguished, but my endeavors have not had much effect. The precise attachment of the officers to their own manner of conducting the arrangements and equipments of the ship has been the cause of much delay. The want of inferior officers, which I understand still exists, has been another. In instances where the necessity of receiving certain articles on board has been urged, the answer has been, that there was no carpenter, sail-maker, gunner, or other petty officers, on board to superintend those departments, and, therefore, the articles could not be received. A refusal to supply all the articles they have demanded, perhaps may have been another cause for the delay. The sails of the ship are not yet bent, and some of the stores remain to be delivered. I hope, however, that a few days will now bring this business to a close. The quantity and quality of many of the articles required at times were such, and the mode of indenting for them became so inconvenient and wasteful of time, that I was induced, on the 30th of June, to write to commissary Guirard on the subject. I enclose a copy of the letter."

BOSTON, June 30, 1801.

CITIZEN COMMISSARY:

As indents of supplies for several departments on board of the corvette Le Berceau are daily presented to me, I wish to call to your remembrance that my instructions from the Secretary of the Navy admit me only, in directing the repairs and the equipment, to restore the corvette to the state she was in anterior to her coming into possession of the United States. I cannot, therefore, you will see, be justified in furnishing any article whatever for her use, that was not on board at that period. If it should at any time happen, therefore, that any article required by the indents should not be immediately furnished, I must beg of you to attribute it to the necessity I feel in adhering to the instructions. In supplying the hammocks and blankets, I probably departed from them; but as humanity required it, my feelings compelled me to furnish those articles.

In any instances where evidence cannot be obtained of the exact quantity, number, or quality of any deficient article, I presume a discretion is placed in me to decide what ought to be done. In those instances it has been, and will be, my disposition to observe a liberal conduct, presuming such to be the disposition of our Government. I will state, as an instance, the cordage and sails furnished the corvette.

The articles necessary to complete her equipment and stores, that are to be furnished by the United States, being all ready to be delivered, I hope that orders will now be given to receive them on board without delay. As it must be desirable to extinguish the daily expenses of subsisting the crew, joined to my wish that she may be in readiness for sea as soon as possible, induces me to make this request.

I trust that some arrangement will shortly be made for supplying any articles that may be required for the use of the corvette, which I may not feel myself warranted in furnishing; but the want of such articles ought not to protract the operations that are necessary to prepare her for sea.

I am, &c.

SAMUEL BROWN.

Monsieur GUIRARD.

Extract of a letter from Samuel Brown, Navy Agent at Boston, to Levi Lincoln, Esq.; without date, but received August 27, 1801.

"The capture was made on the 12th of October, 1800. On the 14th November the corvette arrived here; on the 17th she was libelled and condemned, with her guns, apparel, appurtenances and effects, at the district court in December term, 1800. On the 30th of that month she was dismantled, and sold on the 15th of January last, by the marshal of the district, and bought in for the United States, by order of Stephen Higginson & Co. I cannot find that there was any property taken on board of her that was not libelled, excepting such as was given up to the officers by the captain of the Boston at the time of capture.

"The instructions I received from the Secretary of the Navy on the subject of her repairs, authorized me 'to ascertain the state she was in at the time of her capture, as to her armament, stores, and provision, and to cause her to be put in the same condition, to be delivered up to the French Government.' I have presumed it was the meaning of the instructions, though not fully expressed, that the corvette should be restored, in all respects, to the condition she was in immediately anterior to the commencement of the action with the Boston. I have, therefore, endeavored, in directing the repairs and furnishing the supplies, to be governed, as far as possible, by this principle, which I made known to such of the principal workmen employed in the repairs, as appeared to be expedient. But an adherence to the rule, with a few exceptions, was soon found impracticable; but every departure produced an expense to the United States: for example, the stays, shrouds, and all the cordage, were unavoidably replaced with new for old. The rule, of course, was violated, as the old was not worth more than two-thirds the price of new. The corvette was, in this respect, therefore, placed in a better condition than she was at the commencement of the action; but the United States lost by it the difference in the value of the new and old cordage. This was also the case with her sails, with her masts, spars, tops, and caps; with the carpenter's work, with the iron work, and with many other supplies too numerous to be detailed here. Her stores, &c. thus furnished, may, I presume, be estimated to be worth, on an average, thirty per cent. more than the stores they have replaced."

GEORGETOWN, 6 Vendemiaire, year 10, (Sept. 28, 1801.)

It is with much pleasure that citizen Pichon communicates to Mr. Madison the enclosed extract of a letter which he has just received from Governor La Crosse. It will show the disposition which animates this officer, as well as the spirit in which his instructions are conceived. General La Crosse, in the same despatch, while replying to the instances which citizen Pichon, as is known to Mr. Madison, had made to him, for indemnifying immediately the five or six cases of prizes which come within the treaty, opens to him, with great confidence, the motives which have induced him to refer the claims for restitution to the Government. The first is, the exhausted state of his funds; the second, the obligation, which he really and conscientiously believed himself under, of referring the question to the council of prizes, which, according to the law whereby it is established, pronounces in the last resort; the prizes in question being posterior to its establishment. The third motive is, the desire which he has to receive from Government answers to some questions which he had proposed upon this kind of business, his present instructions not being sufficiently particular for him to act upon. The general, besides, assures citizen Pichon of two things: first, that immediately upon the decision of the council being known, he will pursue the captors with all possible severity; second, that he will himself, as soon as the minister replies to his questions, use all his efforts to indemnify the sufferers.

General La Crosse also advises citizen Pichon that he will be under the necessity of imposing a duty upon the entry and exportation of merchandise from the colony. When the measure is taken, citizen Pichon will be informed of it, and he will communicate it to Mr. Madison, whom he prays to accept his respects.

Extract of a letter from Rear Admiral La Crosse, Captain General of Guadaloupe and its dependencies, to Citizen Pichon, Commissary General, and Chargé des Affaires of the French republic, dated

14 FRUCTIDOR, year 9, (September 1, 1801.)

[With the note of L. A. Pichon, of September 28, 1801.]

"A very important object, that of the vessels of the United States carrying away our black cultivators, obliges me to take a very rigorous resolution against those who so audaciously violate the public law. Lately an American captain took six, which he carried off with him. He was arrested and convicted of the offence. But in taking general measures upon this subject, I thought that I ought to give a proof of the indulgence of the French Government towards the subjects of a nation with which we ought to be intimately connected. I shall be glad, if you will confer upon it with the Secretary of State of the United States, because I am convinced, beforehand, that he will find no measures severe enough for punishing such a violation of the laws of our territory. You will do me the greatest pleasure to give me your ideas and his upon this subject.

"LA CROSSE."

BOSTON, October 31, 1801.

SIR:

I now enclose an account of the repairs made on, and the supplies furnished to, the French national corvette, Le Berceau, agreeably to your instructions of the 2d of April last, amounting to thirty-two thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine dollars and fifty-four cents, to wit: supplies from public property, eighteen thousand three hundred and forty-five dollars and ten cents; and bills discharged by cash for repairs and supplies, fourteen thousand four hundred and ninety-four dollars and forty-four cents. As some of the indents for supplies were not made out till a short time previously to her departure, I have not, therefore, been able to furnish the account before this time. I have thought it would be proper, in order to show, as fully as possible, the state of her equipment, to begin the account by detailing the supplies furnished from the inventory of the stores purchased with the hull of the corvette by Messrs. Higginson & Co., the late agents; but presuming the cost of those stores has been forwarded to the Navy Department, I have supposed it to be unnecessary to carry out a price against them. The supplies furnished from the property of the public follow next in the account, to which I have affixed a price. And lastly the bills for repairs and supplies which have been discharged by cash.

Some of the stores of the inventory of Le Berceau were left on hand after the equipment, which, with a quantity of old copper taken from her bottom, have been delivered to Major Gibbs, whose receipt is enclosed.

In your letter of the 8th July, you have advised that it would be proper for me to state particularly, by letter to your Department, the repairs and supplies received by the Le Berceau at the public expense. You have also directed to be stated the precise condition she was in, as to her equipment of every kind, on the delivery to the officers appointed on the part of the French republic to receive her. On the 23d June she was formally delivered up, but as many of the supplies to her were necessarily made after that time, I conceive the object intended would not be embraced by stating her condition at that period. I think there is no better way of ascertaining the repairs and supplies she received at the public expense, and the condition of her equipment at the termination of the supplies, than by a reference to the account, which I hope you will think to be sufficiently explanatory. But it may not, however, be amiss in me to make some general observations on the subject. I shall, therefore, say, that the best shipwrights, blacksmiths, caulkers, joiners, mast-makers, riggers, and other workmen in this place, were employed on the repairs; that their work was well executed; and that the materials furnished for the purpose were of the best kind; that, wherever the copper on her bottom appeared to have received any injury, it was repaired with new. In these respects there cannot be a doubt of her being placed in a better condition than she was in at the period immediately anterior to the action with the Boston. Her masts, bowsprit, spars, tops and caps, were all new, and made in the best and most substantial manner. Her shrouds, stays, and cordage were also all new, and of the best quality, being made of the finest yarns, excepting about four tons of the latter, supplied from the inventory purchased by the late agents at auction. She was furnished with a new cable of eighteen inches, one hundred and twenty fathoms in length, and amply supplied with spare cordage. In addition to upwards of thirty sails that were saved from the wreck, which were put in good order, she was furnished with a complete new suit of sails, made of the best duck. Her condition, as to her masts, spars, shrouds, stays, and sails, was doubtless made much better by the repairs than at the period referred to above.

Her supply of blocks and block-work was ample. She was furnished with a new barge, and her other boats were well repaired, and she was abundantly supplied with water casks. The surgeon's department was well furnished, excepting amputating instruments, which were not supplied, as it was discovered that her former surgeon had kept possession of those that were on board at the capture. Her cabin was sufficiently furnished with tables, desks, chairs, crockery ware, and other furniture. In these respects there cannot be a doubt she was also placed in a better condition than she was in at the period before referred to.

In conforming to the indents of the captain, she was furnished with beef, pork, bread, beans, rice, flour, oil, rum, wine, and other stores, for a voyage of three months, which were of the best kind.

The gunpowder, and other military stores supplied her, were also furnished in conformity to the indents of the captain.

She mounted on her battery twenty-two nine pound cannons, and two short twelve pound carronades.

On the 26th of last month she departed from hence for sea. The pilot that carried her out has since returned, having continued on board until she was fifty leagues at sea, when he was put on board of a vessel bound hither.

The bills in the account, agreeably to the abstract enclosed, marked No. 1, amounting to five hundred and nineteen dollars and thirty-seven cents, may not, perhaps, be considered as proper charges against the outfits of the corvette, as they were for supplies so made to her crew, soon after her arrival here, and for their transportation to New York. I have presumed, however, that there would be no impropriety in placing them therein.

The bills and supplies charged agreeably to abstract enclosed, marked No. 2, amounting to three thousand four hundred and eighty dollars, and eighty-two cents, for the hire of Apple island, for blankets and hammocks, for the transportation of the crew from New York, and for their subsistence after their arrival here, till they were ordered by the captain to repair on board the corvette, I have supposed, from the nature of the supplies and charges, might be reimbursed by the French Government. Necessity obliged me to furnish them, as the French commissary had then neither money nor credit, to enable him to do it. I also forward by this post, in a separate enclosure, the vouchers of the bills paid for the supplies made to Le Berceau, being from No. 1 to No. 114.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most humble servant,

SAMUEL BROWN.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 173. [1st SESSION.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 20, 1802.

APRIL 20, 1802.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I transmit you a report from the Secretary of State, with the information desired by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th of January, relative to certain spoliations, and other proceedings therein referred to.

TH: JEFFERSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 18, 1802.

The Secretary of State respectfully reports to the President the information requested by the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 8th of January last, relative to spoliations committed on the commerce of the United States, under Spanish authority; and also relative to the imprisonment of the American consul at Saint Jago de Cuba.

This report has been delayed longer than was wished; but the delay has been made unavoidable, by the sickness and absence of the chief clerk in this Department, who had partially gone through the necessary researches, and could most readily have completed them.

JAMES MADISON.

PHILADELPHIA, October 10, 1801.

SIR:

The situation in which I am placed, as president of an incorporated insurance company, affords me a pretence for addressing the Secretary of State on a subject in which I conceive the honor and interest of the United States are in a considerable degree involved. But as you will probably receive more formal applications on the same subject from other quarters, I shall be the less formal in my communication, considering it merely as an auxiliary which may or may not be brought into action, as occasion may require. The chamber of commerce of this city have been collecting materials on which to form an address to the Government, concerning the depredations lately made by the Spaniards on our commerce, in full confidence that proper measures will be taken to obtain from the Spanish Government compensation for the injuries sustained, and security from further depredations.

The sufferings and apprehensions of suffering from such depredations are far from being confined to this city: they extend to every sea-port in the Union, and though the merchants and insurers feel them most pointedly in the first instance, they are more or less affecting to every individual in the United States. I have lately received a letter of request from the three incorporated insurance companies in Baltimore, to join in devising a mode of laying the matter before our Government. The chamber of commerce having previously taken up the business, I communicated this letter to them, presuming it will be properly regarded.

Since the measures lately taken by the British Government respecting their colonial admiralty jurisdictions, we have perceived a sensible abatement of their unjustifiable treatment of the American commerce; and it is but justice to the French to admit, that, since the last convention, they have generally desisted from capturing our vessels, and have treated them in a friendly manner. It seems improbable, therefore, that they have either authorized or countenanced these captures by the Spaniards; nor can I conceive any ground for them more plausible than the idle pretence of holding Gibraltar in a state of blockade by a few paltry privateers. This, one would suppose, could not afford a tolerable pretence for capturing our vessels bound to their own ports, or others in amity with them, within the Mediterranean.

Vessels bound thither must necessarily pass near Gibraltar, and frequently find occasion to call there for information, or to obtain convoy. I therefore conclude that these depredations have been committed by marauders without the assent or knowledge of the Spanish Government, and that they will be suppressed, and restitution awarded, on application from the United States.

I have the honor to be, with due deference and respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES PETTIT.

JAMES MADISON, Esq. Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, October 10, 1801.

SIR:

I have the honor to send herewith a memorial from the chamber of commerce of this city, on the subject of Spanish captures, together with four letters, received by the owners of the captured vessels, which I pray the favor of you to lay before the President of the United States.

The business to which they relate has occasioned a very strong sensation in the minds of the merchants of this city. The property they have at risk is very great, and their information respecting its insecurity alarming. If Gibraltar is to be considered in a state of blockade, and American vessels directed to call there are, on that account, subject to capture and condemnation, there is reason to fear that most of those which were intended for the Mediterranean are in that predicament. They have generally been directed to call at that port, either to benefit of convoy, or to learn the state of the markets in the ports to which they were destined; and as Algeziras is so situated that few vessels can go in or out of Gibraltar without being seen from thence, it is hardly possible to escape the vigilance of their cruisers.

What the conduct of the Spanish tribunals (with respect to captures of this kind) may be, can only be conjectured, as no ultimate decisions had taken place in the cases immediately referred to. If we are to judge from the information received, and their conduct on former occasions, the prospect is sufficiently discouraging. Where the property has been of small value, it has sometimes been released, after long detention and considerable expense; but as yet we know no instance of restitution where the value was great, nor for what has been plundered by the captors.

The alarm created by these captures is not confined to Philadelphia. A letter from the Insurance Company of Baltimore to the President of the Insurance Company of North America has already been received, proposing a joint representation to the President of the United States on this subject: and there is no doubt but like measures will be pursued by the other trading towns.

It is hoped that the representation now made will be thought of sufficient weight to engage the immediate attention of the President, and that such measures will be adopted as the nature and circumstances of the case require. As other information on this subject is received, it will be communicated to Government; and when any measures are determined on by the President proper for the merchants to know, a communication of them will be thankfully received.

In the meantime, I am, with great respect, sir, your most humble servant.

THOMAS FITZSIMMONS,
President Chamber of Commerce Philadelphia.

Hon. JAMES MADISON, Esq.

To Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States, the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce respectfully represent:

That the commerce between the United States and the ports of the Mediterranean has become very important, and, from its extent, had furnished to the merchants the pleasing expectation that it might be so extended as to compensate, in some measure, for the restrictions they have experienced in other quarters; but, that it has latterly met with obstructions from vessels cruising under Spanish colors, which threaten its extinction.

By recent advices from thence, it appears that a number of American vessels have been captured and carried into the Spanish port of Algeziras; among which are three belonging to this port, and one to Baltimore, the value of which, together, exceeds four hundred thousand dollars.

That although the decision of the courts had not (at the dates of the advices) been made, and although it is possible some part of this property may be liberated, yet it is perfectly ascertained that the vessels were plundered of goods to a considerable amount by the captors, and that the passengers and crews were grossly abused and ill-treated, for which no compensation or retribution was expected.

That the pretence for capturing these vessels is, that they were intended for Gibraltar; and it was publicly declared that all vessels which should touch, or intend to touch, at that port, would, if met with, be subject to like consequences.

That Gibraltar is little resorted to by American vessels for the purposes of trade, but, from its situation in relation to the Mediterranean, they are often obliged to put into that port; and of late, have generally been directed to do so, for the purpose of obtaining convoy from some of the national ships against the Barbary corsairs.

Whether, under present circumstances, Gibraltar ought to be considered as in a state of blockade by the Spaniards, or not, we by no means undertake to determine; but we can assert, with confidence, that the merchants of this city have not had such notice thereof as is usually given by nations acting with good faith to each other; although the United States have had a minister and consuls in that country, and the Spanish Government have constantly had like functionaries residing in this. This Government having given information that the American squadron would rendezvous at that place, and the commander be instructed to give convoy to their vessels when applied for, and he could do it with propriety, their owners were led to conclude that, in endeavoring to benefit of that protection, they were not liable to be molested by any friendly Power.

As it is extremely important to the American merchants to be informed whether, under the existing circumstances, they ought to consider the port of Gibraltar as blockaded, one object of their application to the President is, to obtain that information. Should it be so determined, they trust, till legal notice thereof shall have been given, they ought not to be subject to the losses and detention which they have experienced, and that retribution will be obtained therefor.

They flatter themselves, too, that vessels which do not call there, or which may be obliged to put in by stress of weather, or for convoy, and not for the purposes of trade, may not be carried into the Spanish ports, and undergo the losses attendant on such detention; but that, where their papers are fair and clear, they may be permitted to pursue their voyages without molestation.

In full confidence that the President will take this, their respectful representation, into consideration, they console themselves with the hope that he will take such measures thereon as the nature and importance of the case may, in his opinion, require.

In behalf of the chamber of commerce of Philadelphia:

THOMAS FITZSIMMONS.

PHILADELPHIA, October 10, 1801.

ALGEZIRAS, August 3, 1801.

GENTLEMEN:

I wrote you last in a hurry, acquainting you with the unfortunate capture of the ship Molly, after an action of two hours. You will please to observe, gentlemen, we were attacked under the red flag and French colors, although it appears, and indeed is actually the case, they were under Spanish commissions; and undoubtedly we have a plea and defence against the proceedings of those pirates. Mr. Gibson's communicating to you fully respecting the capture of the ship, and the situation she is in, if there are any hopes of her release, &c. it is unnecessary for me to mention any thing further on that head.

With attention to your interest, I remain, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

RICHARD FLIMM.

Messrs. NICKLIN and GRIFFITH.

ALGEZIRAS, July 26, 1801.

GENTLEMEN:

It is with sincere regret that I have to acquaint you of the capture of your brig Sophia, and of her arrival here on the 24th instant; and last evening, to increase the misfortune, the armed gun-ship, the Molly, towed in by seven Spanish privateers, with whom she had warmly fought for upwards of two hours; but I have the pleasure to say that Mr. Gibson, the captain, and officers, are well: several were wounded. The crew, without exception, have shared a similar fate to that which we experienced on board the Amelia, being plundered of every article of clothing, and otherwise treated with the greatest inhumanity. I made two attempts to get along side, but so rigid are the privateers-men, that I was reluctantly compelled to sheer off; however, I shall use the greatest exertions to afford them relief, and you may be assured of my utmost endeavors to make myself serviceable; and I feel it more particularly my duty where you are so deeply interested. I have offered a trifling gratification to get the Sophia liberated from quarantine, and I am in hopes that to-morrow Mr. Dugan will be on shore. I have received your favors by that gentleman, and have taken means to get the business in a train, the result of which I shall not fail communicating.

In great haste, gentlemen, believe me, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

CLEMENT HUMPHREYS.

P. S. All American vessels that have Gibraltar written on their papers, and met with by Spanish privateers, will be brought in and condemned. The following American vessels, in addition to what I have mentioned, have been sent in since the 24th instant:

Brig Maria, captain Hardie, from Philadelphia,
Brig Milford, —— from Baltimore,
} in quarantine.

Messrs. WILLINGS and FRANCIS.

John Gibson, Esquire, to Messrs. Willings and Francis, Nicklin and Griffith, and Henry Nixon, Philadelphia.

ALGEZIRAS, July 31, 1801.

GENTLEMEN:

It is with sincere pain I inform you of our unfortunate capture by the French and Spanish boats, after an action of two hours. It still bears more hard upon us when we reflect we had every reason to suppose we could have made good our passage to Gibraltar, had our guns been sufficiently heavy for their weight of shot. Our crew went to their quarters with alacrity, and did not offer to desert them.

I have not before this had it in my power to write a line, all communication being with us cut off, until we had given in our declaration to the commander at San Roque, from whence I returned yesterday.

The principal plea for condemnation is our being bound to Gibraltar. Our firing on the gun-boats will be no injury to our cause, as we were attacked by the flag of Tripoli, (a red flag,) and no right to regard any colors afterwards hoisted. By continuing the action until we were come up with by a gunboat in the King's service, we fall directly under the cognizance of Government, and I understand our cause will go direct to Madrid; no notice being taken of it here, which is not the case with those ships who have struck to private armed vessels. In consequence of which, I hope, gentlemen, I shall get more redress, but fear it will be a long time. Those who have to apply here are detained a considerable time, and have their decision ultimately from Madrid.

The ship is stripped, the sails unbent, and a guard of Spanish soldiers put on board by the orders of the commandant, which now puts a stop to any further pillage, which was carried on with so much diligence while under the direction of the privateers-men, that ten thousand dollars will not replace what they have stolen.

By this conveyance I have written to Messrs. Turnbull and Co. of Gibraltar, requesting all the information they can give, as also a credit on Cadiz or Madrid, (could it be obtained without much expense,) by which I might be enabled to give security for a certain amount, and obtain the release of the ship.

This plan appears to be the most eligible, as we were taken by a Government vessel, who are responsible for all damages in case of acquittance; they may, perhaps, be more inclined to accept the obligations of some safe house in Cadiz, than detain the ship until the final decision. I shall anxiously wait an answer from Messrs. Turnbull and Co. (under cover to whom I send this letter,) from whom I expect much information, which is not to be obtained here; Mr. Clement Humphreys being gone to Cadiz, and the American consul, Mr. Molony, a superannuated gentleman, either not having it in his power, or being unwilling to render any assistance to Americans brought in here. On Mr. Turnbull's opinion I shall principally rely in the prosecution of my business.

It is a pity some vessels are not kept constantly cruising in the mouth of the straits. One or two frigates would entirely prevent the depredations of the boats, who are no better in their treatment than the brigand barges in the West Indies. Were our Government to make a spirited representation, I have no doubt but redress might be obtained for the depredations committed on our flag, as they tremble for their possessions in the West Indies and South America. The French commissary has great influence here, and has the power of removing all causes of capture to Paris, where possession has been taken by the French flag, which makes me think ourselves fortunate in not submitting early. All armed French vessels can obtain the privilege of wearing a Spanish flag by paying two thousand dollars, so that there are none but what carry the standard of both nations.

I shall write you by every conveyance, and hope to hear from you, either by the way of Gibraltar, Cadiz, Malaga, or Alicant, under cover to Mr. Molony, American consul here. You will please to be very guarded in your expressions, for fear of your letters falling into the hands of our opponents. Our situation is very delicate; the smallest trifle will condemn the ship and cargo.

Our treatment has been infinitely more harsh than I experienced in Porto Rico, and think we stand as little chance of being liberated as there, unless I can interest our minister, when I go to Madrid, to act strongly in our behalf.

You will please inform me, whether it is necessary for me to stay after the first decision and appeal, if you abandon the property to the underwriter. I consider myself released after the papers are in such a train that their agents can carry on the appeal. As long as the property remains yours, I shall remain by it, and shall, to the utmost of my power, endeavor to protect it.

Remaining, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

JOHN GIBSON.

ALGEZIRAS, August 7, 1801.

GENTLEMEN:

Enclosed you receive a copy of my last to you, under date of the 31st ultimo, forwarded via Gibraltar; since when, nothing has been done in our case. I was in hopes, then, from the information received, of the cause being carried immediately to Madrid, but have been deceived. The point in dispute at present is, who shall have the right of trial, the Government of San Roque or Algeziras, both strenuously contending, and fear we shall have to remain until an order is sent down from court.

Since my last, I have received a letter from Messrs. Turnbull and Co., in reply to the queries asked; they are of opinion we shall certainly be condemned, unless a sum of money is properly applied, which corresponds with my sentiment. Every officer under this corrupt Government is open to bribery, and have no doubt but a few thousand dollars would be the most solid argument we could advance in our defence. Upon the subject of bribery, I beg leave to state my ideas. Whatever sum is applied must be done before a condemnation takes place; otherwise, the cargo will be landed; and, if prevented from being sold (which is not always the case, particularly if valuable,) upon an appeal, it will be pillaged at least 50 per cent. if any time in store, and no vigilance will protect it. As underwriters have hitherto refused paying, unless condemnation takes place, will they not refuse in this instance? Their conduct in this respect has already cost them dear, and, if they pursue, will prevent many from coming forward. Several vessels might have been liberated, by advancing the judge two or three thousand dollars; but the agents, not considering themselves at liberty to do it, have refused, and afterwards compromised for a much larger sum, on carrying on the appeal. In a conversation with Mr. Francis, previous to my departure, I mentioned the subject of ransom, should we unfortunately be captured by the Tripolines, not at that time apprehending any thing from the gun-boats; but he was of opinion I could not ransom the vessel for any thing short of her real value, and would, therefore, decline mentioning the subject in my instructions. It is by no means certain we shall be released, even by offering a sum of money, so many being concerned in our capture; but Messrs. Turnbull and Co. have guarantied the payment of any sum I may choose to advance, and recommend the coming forward immediately. Mr. Clement Humphreys, at present at Cadiz, has mentioned my case to the house of Bernard Lacoste, the particular correspondent of Mr. Leamy; they have offered their services here, and a nephew is now with me, with whom I communicate. Mr. Humphreys, from his long stay, has had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with them, and strongly recommends them as a house of honor, on whom I may place the utmost reliance; they have had the principal American business under their protection, and, from the loans they have made to Government, have considerable influence. The young gentleman, who has come down from Cadiz since my arrival, appears to be pretty well acquainted with the forms and corruptness of the courts, having managed many similar causes, and being personally acquainted with the principal officers here. I have written to Messrs. Grevignee and Co. of Malaga, forwarding them a recommendatory letter from Messrs. Turnbull and Co. Messrs. Grevignee and Co. are known to you gentlemen; their influence in many places in Spain is not doubted, and I believe in this province they have great power. I expect much from their reply, and believe they will be willing to render you every assistance.

Considering the subject maturely, I am determined to go as far as ten to twelve thousand dollars, provided the ship is placed in security, say at Gibraltar, and hope you will be able to arrange matters with the underwriters, should any such advances take place. Convinced that you will think I am acting from motives purely for your interest, and not wantonly and without hesitation running you to expense, induces me to form my determination. Convinced, also, that the prosecution of an appeal will be attended with more expense, and that every prospect of benefit from proceeding on the voyage, if ultimately released, will be destroyed by delay.

I am sorry Captain Flimm incautiously delivered to an American captain, while I was in San Roque, a hasty account of our action. It was meant entirely for your eye, dictated by him, and to be by him enclosed to you. It was a true statement, but was never intended to be made public, and am apprehensive the underwriters may hesitate on finding the guns were not adequate. The conveyance of letters from this place is always attended with danger, the privateers-men being constantly on the watch, endeavoring to intercept all they can; you will not, therefore, be surprised should you not often hear from me: for, in my situation, one letter intercepted would ruin all our plans.

Enclosed you receive copy of our protest in the consulate here; if it is not regular, you must attribute it to the ignorance of the forms, for I am obliged to draw out all writings, our consul not rendering any assistance. Hoping soon to have it in my power to give you better news,

I remain, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

JOHN GIBSON.

To Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States.

NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND, November 10, 1801.

SIR:

The Newport Insurance Company, in Rhode Island, think it a duty they owe to themselves, and those of their fellow-citizens who are immediately concerned in trade, respectfully to represent to the Chief Magistrate of the Union that great spoliations have been, during the present year, committed upon their lawful commerce by vessels acting under authority from the Government of Spain.

As underwriters, we have been unexpectedly injured by these spoliations, and are apprehensive of sustaining further and great losses by a continuance of them; we, therefore, beg leave to remonstrate against them.

The differences between the United States and France having been terminated by their late treaty, and the treaty subsisting between this country and Spain expressly allowing our citizens the liberty of trading to and from the ports of the enemies of the latter, it was presumed that vessels of the United States, destined to ports in the Mediterranean sea, would not be, by being cleared for, or ordered to touch at, a British port, rendered liable to be captured and condemned by the French or Spaniards.

War with several of the Barbary States having been apprehended for some months previous to the declaration of it by the Government of Tripoli, the merchants of the United States had deemed it prudent, for nearly a year past, to have their vessels, when bound to any port in the Mediterranean sea, cleared for, or ordered to touch at, Gibraltar, to obtain information that might lead them to avoid, or to procure convoy to protect them against, the Barbary corsairs. And it has not been unusual for American vessels, in times of the greatest security, to touch at Gibraltar, merely for the purpose of gaining commercial intelligence, always useful, and sometimes absolutely necessary, for the success of their Mediterranean voyages. But, since the existence of the danger alluded to, it has been considered essential to the safety of our merchant vessels, bound as before mentioned, that they should touch at Gibraltar; and, when cleared for, or ordered to touch at, that port, they have been insured at a lower rate than they otherwise would have been. It now appears, however, that clearances and orders of this kind have exposed them to new dangers. They have been, avowedly in consequence of them, taken near Gibraltar, and carried into the port of Algeziras, in Spain, by gunboats and other armed vessels, sailing under the flag and authority of Spain, but in company, as we are informed, with French privateers, and have there been condemned by a Spanish tribunal. We have to regret the capture and condemnation, under the circumstances and in the manner above recited, of two vessels, with valuable cargoes, owned wholly by citizens of the United States, and not laded with any goods contraband of war; in which, as underwriters, we were interested to the amount of thirty thousand dollars; that sum, however, comprising only a small part of the whole value of them. The papers relating to, and proving the capture and condemnation of, one of these ships, called the Hercules, Courtenay, of Newport, we are assured, were transmitted by the owners of her to the Secretary of State, some months since; and the facts respecting the case of the other, called the Molly, of Philadelphia, have, we doubt not, been fully stated to the Secretary by the owners of her, who are merchants of that city. It is, therefore, unnecessary for us, and we shall not presume, to lay before the President all the circumstances attending these two captures. We, nevertheless, think it proper to mention, that it was alleged, on the part of the captors, that Gibraltar had been declared in a state of blockade by the Government of Spain. This declaration was, however, not known here at the time of the sailing from the United States of the two vessels referred to, and of many other vessels that have experienced a similar fate. It can, indeed, be considered only as a pretext for capturing defenceless neutral vessels, when it is known that Gibraltar has not been actually blockaded, for at least several years past, by any Spanish naval force capable of preventing a single British sloop of war from going into or coming out of that port.

The hostile disposition manifested by the Spaniards towards our commerce in the Mediterranean sea and elsewhere, excites in our minds serious apprehensions for its safety, when we consider the reduction that has lately taken place in our navy, and the present unarmed state of our merchant vessels. But, relying upon your assurances to the Legislature of this State, that "commerce will be cherished by you, both from principle and duty," we confidently hope that the powers vested in the President by the constitution and laws of the United States will be exerted to obtain indemnification for the losses, and to prevent a repetition of the injuries of which we complain.

By order and in behalf of the Newport Insurance Company:

SAMUEL ELAM, President,
Attest: J. DENNISON, Secretary.

The subsequent remarks concerning Spanish depredations on American commerce are extracted from Col. Humphreys's letters to the Secretary of State, written at different periods, as will appear below.

"Schooner Active, of Penobscot, Captain Holbrook, from Liverpool, bound to the United States, was captured by a French privateer, recaptured by the English, who restored her to the Americans on board. On her arrival at Gijon, she was seized, and the Americans imprisoned: but both the vessel and crew were afterwards released—13th June, 1800."

"Ship Swansbury, Jonathan Bunting, supercargo, was lately taken by a French privateer and Spanish gunboat, and carried to Cadiz. She was seized because of her destination to Gibraltar. [She was afterwards finally condemned in the supreme council of war]—19th August, 1800."

"Ship Catharine, of Baltimore, James Mills, master, was seized at Barcelona in September, 1800, under pretence that lights were hoisted on board her as a signal, when on the 4th of that month, the boats of a British man-of-war cut two armed vessels out of that harbor—30th September, 1800."

"I still continue to receive frequent reports of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, carried into Algeziras by privateers fitted out in the ports of Spain; and that, in some instances where they have been captured by French and Spanish armed vessels or boats jointly, they have been delivered by the agents of the former to the agents of the latter, under a conviction that they would not, at present, be condemned as legal prizes by French tribunals, of which I have complained in the most explicit terms to the first Secretary of State—13th January, 1801."

"Several of our merchant vessels which had been captured and carried into Algeziras, by Spanish armed boats or vessels, have been set at liberty, but no compensation has been allowed for the great losses and damages occasioned by their unjust detention. In all those cases which have been reported to me, I have taken due measures for maintaining the claims for indemnification—November 5, 1801."

Extract of a letter from Josiah Blakely, Esq., American Consul at St. Jago de Cuba, to the Secretary of State.

"NOVEMBER 1, 1801.

"More than a month ago, by an order from the Intendant at Havana, my person was arrested, books and papers all seized, and stores locked up, and guards placed over them. I was conducted to prison, from which I now write. I have not yet been informed why this took place. At the time, nine vessels were here under my charge. The cash found in my house was taken away. The detention, disappointment, loss, and vexation to the captains of those vessels, and my correspondents, is immense. Some of the goods belonging to others have been given up; some are yet detained.

"My total ignorance of the cause of such very extraordinary treatment has prevented my writing you before, to inform you of my situation; by the questions which have been put me, only can I conjecture.

"In March or April last, the ship Prudence, of Boston, Captain Rogers, last from another island, at which she had sold her cargo, came to this port for a cargo of molasses. No molasses could be had. She then left this for a port near Havana, in search of molasses. When arrived near Havana, the ship was boarded by the officers, who demanded where from. She answered from St. Jago de Cuba. Not having entered or cleared at this port, she could show no such papers, and was instantly seized; all her papers taken possession of, among which, it is said, was found the sales of goods, landed from the ship at this place. No such goods had been entered. This sale, it is said, was made by one Peter Lay, who, as he spoke three languages, did much business for me; he also did business for himself, and many others. But, it is said, he signed this sale, as done by me. If any goods were landed, or sold from said ship, I knew nothing of, nor had I any thing to do with the business. Mr. Lay having long since left this island, I can get no information from him on the subject.

"My books and papers have been critically examined by the officers here, who have reported that they can find no such sales in my books or papers, nor even the name of such a ship. They declare that, by all the evidence they can get, I am wholly innocent, not only of that charge, but of ever attempting, in the least degree, to defraud the customs. Thus the custom-house officers have declared.

"With the Governor here, and all the first people of the city, I have lived, not only in habits of friendship, but of intimacy. They all appear distressed at my situation, and say they will at all times certify to the strict propriety of my conduct, both as a merchant and a resident. Not a single inhabitant here has ever made the least complaint of my conduct since among them.

"If Captain Rogers landed or sold goods from his ship Prudence, at this place, as in fact I knew nothing of it, how far I can be implicated by a signature said to be done for me, particularly when such act was illegal, I should think must depend upon circumstances which cannot apply in this case.

"As I have been presented with no charge whatever, the whole of what I have written may be foreign to the real cause of my being thus situated. It is probable the mail which is to arrive from Havana fifteen days hence will bring despatches concerning me. Being impatient to inform my Government of my situation, I have troubled you with the foregoing, which is all I know of the subject. I have forwarded to Havana my protest against the usage I have received. The Americans being permitted free access to my apartment, and I permitted by the Governor here to continue the functions of my office, I continue to execute the duties of it.

"The damages to me and my correspondents being immense, the best informed lawyers here say, large damages can be recovered of the Intendant; but situated as I shall be with him, it is not probable I can obtain relief, but through the demands of my Government. Soon as I can obtain any official charges or legal statement of this business, I will forward to you copies of the same. From the officers of Government and the inhabitants of this place, and part of the island, I have experienced politeness and friendship, for which I render the homage due. But from the nation do we not receive many insults? In these seas our flag is constantly insulted by their privateers. When I mention the treaty, their officers affect to treat it with the greatest contempt, saying it does not extend to the colonies, &c. Possibly the Intendant at Havana is highly displeased at some of the protests I have made against the cruel treatment some of our vessels have experienced. In them I only declared the truth, and the rights of our nation."

Extract of a letter from Josiah Blakely, Esq., American Consul at St. Jago de Cuba, to the Secretary of State.

DECEMBER 26, 1801.

"On the first of November last, I wrote you on the unpleasant subject of the cruel treatment I had experienced in this place by an order from the Intendant at Havana. In that letter I informed you, that on the 18th of September last my person was arrested and conducted to the common prison in this city. My account books and the keys of my cabinets, trunks, &c. all taken from me; stores all locked up; guards placed around my house and stores.

"My account books, receipt books, &c. were most critically examined from the moment I commenced business in this place to that day. Each article of goods in my stores was also examined, to know if properly entered, the duty paid, &c. After many days' examination, the King's officers were forced to report that they could not find the least cause of complaint. I was not informed why this took place, yet I was still confined, and the embargo continued upon my stores and property.

"At the time of this arrest, I protested, in the most solemn manner, against such proceedings; demanding to know the cause of such disgrace to myself, total ruin to my business, disappointment and loss to my correspondents, and insult to my Government and nation. The only answer I could obtain was, 'it was the order of the Intendant at Havana;' that I would soon be informed why this had taken place, my person be liberated, and the embargo be taken from my property.

"Though in such extreme distress, I felt unwilling to be troubling my Government with complaints so very awkward and unintelligible. Thus situated, I have waited the arrival of one post after another from Havana; but, since the tremendous order for my arrest, and the embargo upon all my property, I am informed by the Governor here not a line has come to him respecting me or the property so embargoed, though much of it was in provisions of perishable articles.

"Insulted, ruined in my business, distressed, and wholly in the power of those, perhaps, whose official existence will depend on my ruin and apparent guilt, I shall be under the necessity of humbly praying permission, as a native citizen, merchant, and consul of the United States, to approach the high Executive of my nation, there to pray that my tale of woe may be heard; that the unpleasant application I am under the necessity of making to the court of Spain for compensation, for the great injury done me and my correspondents, the unlawful insult offered to my commission and nation, may be supported and enforced.

"When this arrest and embargo first took place, the whole port appeared lost in astonishment. It seems the order of the Intendant at Havana was dreadfully severe and positive. I was writing in my office when the King's officers entered to execute the awful mandate; it is said they brought with them a guard of fifteen soldiers. The whole city stood silent in wonder and expectation. The high charge given the guards; the number of sentinels; my person conducted to prison; all my stores instantly shut; an instant stop put to all my mercantile proceedings; the rigorous solemnity with which the whole was conducted, deterred the good people here almost from looking at me: few of them had sufficient courage to visit me; many of my friends feared even to send their domestics to inquire how I was; many supposed the order must have come from the King himself, by the awful severity with which it was executed. I then thought that my crimes had been so great, that, like Cain, a mark of infamy had been set upon me by God Almighty.

"My fast declining state of health, when in prison, induced the Governor here, on the 25th of November, humanely to permit me to leave the prison, on giving bail for my person. I hoped my statement of damages, and certificate from the civil officers and principal inhabitants of this city respecting my peaceable, proper conduct since residing here, would have accompanied this, but, since I have been out of prison, all the principal inhabitants of this city have been at a neighboring village, celebrating to the Virgin an annual feast. The holidays, in which no business can be done, will now continue for some time. Soon as possible, I shall forward to your office the said papers. I pray you to inform the President of the United States of the contents of this letter."

7th CONGRESS.] No. 174. [1st SESSION.

FRANCE.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 22, 1802.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed the 5th of February last, to whom were referred the memorials and petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, and resident merchants therein, praying relief in the case of depredations committed on their vessels and cargoes, while in the pursuit of lawful commerce, by the cruisers of the French republic, during the late European war, made the following report:

On the 6th day of February, 1778, a treaty of amity and commerce was concluded between the United States and France, containing a variety of reciprocal commercial stipulations and regulations between the two countries, which were deemed by both nations to be in force at the time of the commencement of the late European war, and to continue so for some time thereafter. On the 9th of May, 1793, after Great Britain had become a party in the war, and whilst the treaty between the United States and France was considered to be in force by both nations, the National Convention passed a decree relative to the commerce of neutrals, the first article of which is in the following words: "The French ships of war and privateers may stop and bring into the ports of the republic such neutral vessels as are loaded, in whole, or in part, either with provisions belonging to neutrals, and destined for enemy ports, or with merchandise belonging to enemies." This decree, after being several times repealed and re-enacted, was finally repealed on the 27th of July following. On the 2d of July, 1796, the Executive Directory made the following decree: "That all neutral or allied Powers shall, without delay, be notified that the flag of the French republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches, or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them." On the 1st of August, 1796, the special agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands made a decree to the following effect: "That all vessels laden with contraband should be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors." On the 27th of November, 1796, the commission delegated by the French republic to the Windward Islands, made a resolve to the following effect: "That the captains of French national vessels and privateers are authorized to stop and bring into the ports of the colony American vessels bound to English ports, or coming from the said ports." On the 1st of February, 1797, the special agents of the French Directory to the Windward Islands made a decree to the following effect: "Subjecting to capture and confiscation neutral vessels destined for the Windward and Leeward islands of America, delivered up to the English, and occupied and defended by the emigrants. These ports are said to be Martinico, St. Lucie, Tobago, Demerara, Berbice, Essequibo, Port au Prince, St. Marks, L'Archaye, and Jeremie. The decree also subjects to capture all vessels which have cleared out for the West Indies, generally." On the 2d of March, 1797, the Executive Directory made the following decree: "After the seventeenth article of the treaty of London, of the 19th of November, 1794, all merchandises of the enemy's, or merchandise not sufficiently ascertained to be neutral, conveyed under American flags, shall be confiscated; but the ship, on board of which such merchandise shall be found, shall be released and given to the proprietor. The commissaries of the Directory are enjoined to accelerate, by all the means in their power, the decision of the contests which shall arise, either upon the validity of the captures of the cargoes, or upon freights and insurances."

"According to the eighteenth article of the treaty of London, dated the 19th of November, 1794, relative to articles declared contraband by the twenty-fourth article of the treaty, dated February 6, 1778, are added the following:

"Ship timber,
"Oakum, pitch, and rosin,
"Copper for sheathing vessels,
"Sails, hemp, and cordage, and every thing which serves directly or indirectly to the arming and equipping of vessels, excepting bar iron and fir in planks. These articles shall be confiscated as often as they shall be destined, or attempted to be carried to the enemy.

"According to the twenty-first article of the treaty of London, of the above date, every American who shall hold a commission from the enemies of France, as well as every seaman of that nation, composing the crew of the ships and vessels, shall, by this fact alone, be declared piratical, and treated as such, without suffering the party to establish that the act was the consequence of threats or violence.

"In pursuance of the law of the 14th of February, 1793, the regulations of the 21st of October, 1794, and of the 26th of July, shall be complied with, according to their form and tenor.

"Every American ship shall therefore be deemed a lawful prize which shall not have on board a bill of lading in due form, according to the plan annexed to the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, the execution of which is enjoined by the twenty-fifth and twenty-seventh articles of that treaty.

"The commissioners of the Executive Directory are required to carry into effect the penalties that attach on all clandestine attempts that may be made by American, or vessels belonging to any other nation, to pass as neutral, on board the vessel where the fraud is attempted to be practised, in the manner that these penalties have been repeatedly carried into effect during the present war. The penalty shall attach where the blanks in the consignments and invoices are not filled up, though signed and sealed; where the papers are in the form of letters, containing fictitious signatures; where are double passports or policies, specifying different destinations; where consignment is made to two or more factors; and where there are different receipts, or papers of any kind, which consign the whole or part of the same goods to different owners or different destinations.

"By this article, provisions of the treaty of the 9th Frimaire last, relative to freight and insurance, are repealed, as far as they apply to insurance.

"The present treaty shall be published in the bulletin of the laws. The Ministers of the Marine, and of the Colonies, of Justice, and for Foreign Affairs, are charged with the execution of it in their respective Departments."

The American commerce must have suffered considerable spoliations in consequence of these various regulations of the French Government and its dependencies.

On the 5th and 22d of June, 1797, the President of the United States appointed three envoys extraordinary for the purpose of adjusting the differences which then existed between the two nations, and on the 15th July, 1797, gave instructions to the envoys, which, so far as they respect the depredations on the commerce of the United States, are in the following words:

"In respect to the depredations on our commerce, the principal objects will be to agree on an equitable mode of examining and deciding the claims of our citizens, and the manner and periods of making them compensation. As to the first, the seventh article of the British, and the twenty-first of the Spanish treaty, present approved precedents to be adopted with France. The proposed mode of adjusting those claims, by commissioners appointed on each side, is so perfectly fair, that we cannot imagine it will be refused. But when the claims are adjusted, if payment in specie cannot be obtained, it may be found necessary to agree, in behalf of our citizens, that they shall accept public securities, payable with interest at such periods as the state of the French finances shall render practicable. These periods you will endeavor, as far as possible, to shorten.

"Not only the recent depredations under color of the decrees of the Directory of the 2d of July, 1796, and the 2d of March, 1797, or under the decrees of their agents, or the illegal sentences of their tribunals, but all prior ones, not already satisfactorily adjusted, should be put in this equitable train of settlement. To cancel many, or all, of the last mentioned claims, might be the effect of the decree of the Executive Directory of the 2d of March last, reviving the decree of the 9th of May, 1793: but this being an ex post facto regulation, as well as a violation of the treaty between the United States and France, cannot be obligatory on the former. Indeed the greater part, probably nearly all the captures and confiscations in question have been committed in direct violation of that treaty, or of the law of nations. But the injuries arising from the capture of enemies' property in vessels of the United States may not be very extensive; and if for such captured property the French Government will, agreeably to the law of nations, pay the freight and reasonable demurrage, we shall not, on this account, any further contend. But of ship timber and naval stores taken and confiscated by the French, they ought to pay the full value, because our citizens continued their traffic in those articles under the faith of the treaty with France. On these two points we ought to expect that the French Government will not refuse to do us justice: and the more, because it has not, at any period of the war, expressed its desire that the commercial treaty should, in these respects, be altered.

"Besides the claims of our citizens for depredations on their property, there are many arising from express contracts made with the French Government, or its agents, or founded on the seizure of their property in French ports. Other claims have arisen from the long detention of a multitude of our vessels in the ports of France. The wrong hereby done to our citizens was acknowledged by the French Government, and in some, perhaps in most of the cases, small payments towards indemnifications have been made; the residue still remains to be claimed.

"All these just demands of our citizens will merit your attention. The best possible means of compensation must be attempted. These will depend on what you shall discover to be practicable, in relation to the French finances. But an exception must be made in respect to debts due to our citizens by the contracts of the French Government, and its agents, if they are comprehended in any stipulation; and an option reserved to them, jointly or individually, either to accept the means of payment which you shall stipulate, or to resort to the French Government directly for the fulfilment of its contracts.

"Although the reparation for losses sustained by the citizens of the United States, in consequence of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations, or forcible seizures or detentions, is of very high importance, and is to be pressed with the greatest earnestness, yet it is not to be insisted on as an indispensable condition of the proposed treaty. You are not, however, to renounce these claims of our citizens, nor to stipulate that they be assumed by the United States as a loan to the French Government."

Whilst these envoys were in Paris, endeavoring to effect the objects of their mission, the French Government, on the 18th of January, 1798, passed the following law:

"The character of vessels, relative to their quality of neuter or enemy, shall be determined by their cargo; in consequence, every vessel found at sea, loaded in whole or in part with merchandise, the production of England or of her possessions, shall be declared good prize, whoever the owner of these goods or merchandise may be.

"Every foreign vessel which, in the course of her voyage, shall have entered into an English port, shall not be admitted into a port of the French republic, except in case of necessity; in which case, she shall be bound to depart from the said port as soon as the causes of her entry shall have ceased.

The envoys not having been received by the Directory, and not having effected the object of their mission, on the 28th day of May, 1798, the Government of the United States passed the following law:

An act more effectually to protect the commerce and coasts of the United States.

Whereas, armed vessels sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the republic of France, have committed depredations on the commerce of the United States, and have recently captured the vessels and property of citizens thereof, on or near the coasts, in violation of the law of nations and treaties between the United States and the French nation; therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized to instruct and direct the commanders of the armed vessels belonging to the United States to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, to be proceeded against according to the law of nations, any such armed vessel which shall have committed, or which shall be found hovering on the coasts of the United States, for the purpose of committing depredations on the vessels belonging to citizens thereof; and, also, to retake any ship or vessel of any citizen or citizens of the United States, which may have been captured by any such armed vessel.

On the 7th of July, 1798, the Government of the United States passed the following law:

An act to declare the treaties heretofore concluded with France no longer obligatory on the United States.

Whereas, the treaties concluded between the United States and France have been repeatedly violated on the part of the French Government, and the just claims of the United States for reparation of the injuries so committed have been refused, and their attempts to negotiate an amicable adjustment of all complaints between the two nations have been repelled with indignity: And whereas, under authority of the French Government, there is yet pursued against the United States a system of predatory violence, infracting the said treaties, and hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States are, of right, freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties, and of the consular convention heretofore concluded between the United States and France; and that the same shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States.

On the 9th July, 1798, the Government of the United States passed a law further to protect the commerce of the United States, the two first sections of which relate to this subject, and are in the following words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels which are, or which shall be, employed in the service of the United States, to subdue, seize, and take any armed French vessel which shall be found within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or elsewhere, on the high seas; and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and the goods or effects which shall be found on board the same, being French property, shall be brought within some port of the United States, and shall be duly proceeded against, and condemned as forfeited, and shall accrue, and be distributed, as by law is or shall be provided, respecting the captures which shall be made by the public armed vessels of the United States.

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant to the owners of private armed ships and vessels of the United States, who shall make application therefor, special commissions in the form which he shall direct, and under the seal of the United States; and such private armed vessels, when duly commissioned, as aforesaid, shall have the same license and authority for the subduing, seizing, and capturing any armed French vessel, and for the re-capture of the vessels, goods, and effects of the people of the United States, as the public armed vessels of the United States may by law have; and shall be, in like manner, subject to such instructions as shall be ordered by the President of the United States, for the regulation of their conduct. And the commissions which shall be granted, as aforesaid, shall be revocable at the pleasure of the President of the United States.

On the 28th day of May, 1798, instructions were given to the commanders of armed vessels, belonging to the United States, in the following words:

"Whereas, it is declared by an act of Congress, passed the 28th day of May, 1798, that armed vessels sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the French republic, have committed depredations on the commerce of the United States, and have recently captured the vessels and property of citizens thereof, on and near the coasts, in violation of the law of nations and treaties between the United States and the French nation:

"Therefore, and in pursuance of the said act, you are instructed and directed to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, to be proceeded against according to the laws of nations, any armed vessel sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the French republic, which shall have committed, or which shall be found hovering on the coasts of the United States for the purpose of committing, depredations on the vessels belonging to citizens thereof; and, also, to retake any ship or vessel of any citizen or citizens of the United States which may have been captured by any such armed vessel.

On the 10th day of July, 1798, further instructions were given to the commanders of armed vessels of the United States, in the words following:

"In pursuance of the acts of Congress, passed the 28th day of May, the 20th day of June, and the 9th day of July,

"You are hereby authorized, instructed, and directed to subdue, seize, and take any armed French vessel or vessels, sailing under authority, or pretence of authority, from the French republic, which shall be found within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or elsewhere, on the high seas; and such captured vessel, with her apparel, guns, and appurtenances, and the goods and effects which shall be found on board of the same, to bring within some port of the United States; and, also, retake any vessel, goods, and effects, of the United States, or persons resident therein, which may have been captured by any French vessel, in order that proceedings may be had concerning such capture or re-capture, in due form of law, and as to right shall appertain."

Instructions were also given, after the passage of the aforesaid laws, to the captains of private armed vessels of the United States, to the same effect with the instructions given to the public armed vessels of the United States.

In consequence of these measures, the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, between the United States and France, in virtue of which most of the reclamations were made, became no longer obligatory; a partial state of hostility took place between the United States and the French republic; several hostile actions occurred between the armed vessels of the two nations, and several captures were made of French vessels, both by public and private armed vessels of the United States, which have been condemned and sold as lawful prizes.

On the 25th of February, 1799, the President of the United States nominated three other envoys extraordinary, for the purpose of adjusting the differences between the United States and the French republic; and, on the 30th day of November, 1800, a convention for terminating certain differences which had arisen between the United States and the French republic, was concluded at Paris. On the 3d day of February, 1801, the Senate passed a resolution in the constitutional mode, advising the ratification of the said convention, provided the second article be expunged, &c. The second article is in the following words:

"The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree, at present, respecting the treaty of alliance, of the 6th of February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed; the parties will negotiate further on these subjects, at a convenient time; and, until they may have agreed upon these points, the said treaties and convention have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows." This article was introduced into the convention at the intimation of the American envoys, being, it is to be presumed, the best stipulation it was in their power, at that time, to make for negotiating hereafter upon the indemnities mutually due, or claimed by the citizens of the two countries. On the 18th of February, 1801, the President of the United States, in conformity with the advice of the Senate, did ratify the said convention, excluding therefrom the aforesaid second article. The Senate not having accompanied their advice for expunging the said second article with any explanation of their motive for the measure, it was understood, both by the Chief Consul and the American envoy then at Paris, that the object of expunging the said second article was, 'the retrenchment of the respective pretensions of the two Governments, which were the objects of the said second article;' and, with an explanation to that effect, on the 31st of July, 1801, the Chief Consul ratified the said convention. The convention thus ratified, was laid before the Senate, by the President of the United States, on its return from Paris; and, on the 19th day of December, 1801, the Senate resolved, "that they considered the said convention as fully ratified;" and, in pursuance thereof, on the 21st of the same month, the President caused the said convention to be promulgated as it was originally ratified.

From these circumstances, and a recurrence to the fifth article of said convention, in the following words: "The debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other, or by the individuals of one with the individuals of the other, shall be paid; or the payment may be prosecuted in the same manner as if there had been no misunderstanding between the two states. But this clause shall not extend to indemnities claimed on account of captures or confiscations." It appears that the exclusion of the second article of the convention was considered as a renunciation of the indemnities claimed by the citizens of the United States for spoliations and depredations upon their commerce, so far as the Government might otherwise have been instrumental in obtaining such indemnities.

Upon the whole view of the case, the committee submit it to the House to determine whether the Government of the United States be, in any respect, bound to indemnify the memorialists; and whether there be any ground for discrimination between the cases of losses sustained before the acts of the 28th of May, 1798, the 7th of July, 1798, and the 9th of July, 1798, and cases of losses sustained after those periods.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 175. [2d SESSION.

BARBARY POWERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, ON THE 15TH DECEMBER, 1802.

Extract from the President's message of that date.

"A small force in the Mediterranean will still be necessary to restrain the Tripoline cruisers, and the uncertain tenure of peace, with some other of the Barbary Powers, may eventually require that force to be augmented."

Extracts of letters from James Leander Cathcart, Esq. Consul of the United States of America at Algiers, to the Secretary of State, dated at

"LEGHORN, July 2, 1801.

"SIR:

"The King of Sweden has protested the bills drawn by Mr. Tornquist, to the amount of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, the sum promised by him to the Bashaw of Tripoli as the price of peace, and he has resolved to repel the demand for an annuity of twenty thousand dollars, by force of arms, and will send a squadron against Tripoli as soon as he has settled his affairs with Great Britain."

"Many of our merchants and captains dispute the consul's authority to detain their vessels in port, nowithstanding the national consequences of their capture being fully explained to them. I, therefore, presume that this point merits the immediate determination of Government, and that positive instructions ought to be given to all consuls in the Mediterranean, in order that they may know whether they have power to retain the vessels of their nation in port, as the consuls of all other nations have, or whether they are to permit them to sail after being informed of war being declared against us by any of the Barbary States."

Extracts from Mr. ——— letters to Mr. Cathcart, dated at Tripoli, from 12 March, to 30 April.

"TRIPOLI, March 12, 1802.

"The Bashaw expects the frigate formerly commanded by Murad Raiz, and blockaded by the ships of the United States at Gibraltar, from Tangier, with a cargo of corn; having sent an ambassador to solicit the favor from the Emperor of Morocco."

"28th do. was launched a xebeck of fourteen guns, which is to be fitted out as a cruiser."

"I have been disputing with the Jews, but have only recovered one thousand three hundred dollars from them yet."

"The Bashaw had taken the opinion of his counsellors, in writing relative to the American war; only three were opposed to it. Sidi Mahomet Daguize, the Grand Kaya, and another whom I do not know.

"On the arrival of the American frigates before Tripoli, the Bashaw began to reflect on the advice he had received: now the scene is changed, Murad Raiz, the chief promoter of the war, is in very low estimation; his companion Raiz Squsy has literally drank himself into the other world about a month ago, and Murad was in a fair way to follow him, when a little recollection made him abstain from liquor some days."

"April 22d. It is currently reported that the Bashaw intends to fit out five cruisers, three quarter galleys, a guerlingwich, or polacre, that returned from a cruize with a prize a few days ago, and a xebeck."

"April 30th. I have to inform you that two quarter galleys of twenty-eight oars, and four carriage guns, and four swivels, manned with from fifty to sixty men each, one commanded by Raiz Halifa, and the other by Raiz Osman Candiotto, are ready to sail upon a cruise."

Extract of letters from Mr. ——— to Mr Cathcart, dated at

"TRIPOLI, May 10, 1802.

"On the evening of the 1st instant, the consuls were summoned to the castle, when the Bashaw, in the presence of the two Swedish officers, stated the treatment he had received from Sweden since the conclusion of Tornquist's treaty, and compared his treatment to them since that period, and ended his observations by asking, if he had not sufficient reason to declare war against that nation; and then solemnly declared that he never intended to enter into another treaty with Sweden. War was to be declared the next day; nevertheless, it was postponed to the 5th instant, in hopes that, by continuing the negotiation, an accommodation would take place; but the admiral would not listen to any terms but those he proposed, which were as follows: "The Swedish prisoners to be liberated without ransom; peace to be established without paying any consideration whatever for it, as presents, or otherwise, upon the same terms as it was before the declaration of war in 1800." The admiral alleged that the Bashaw, having captured Swedish property to a considerable amount, could not possibly have any claim against Sweden.

"I know the Bashaw of Tripoli has made an effort to conclude a treaty with the United States of America through the mediation of Algiers, and I am very much mistaken if there are not at this moment other plans under consideration, as several of the Bashaw's adherents endeavor to gain his confidence by suggesting them."

"On the night of the 19th instant departed two galliots (quarter galleys) to cruise along shore; it is said they are in quest of some American vessels that are at Susa."

Extract of letters from James Leander Cathcart, Esq. Consul of the United States of America at Algiers, to the Secretary of State, dated at

"LEGHORN, July 4, 1802.

"You will please to observe that the cruisers of Tripoli have been frequently at sea since the war commenced, and thence conceive the danger our merchant ships have been exposed to. From the returns of our consuls, you will be informed of the extent of our commerce in this sea, which never was so valuable as it was at the period, and since the Bashaw of Tripoli commenced hostilities. I have seen twenty-four sail of American vessels in this port at once last year, two-thirds of whom were unarmed. Can the wisdom of Government devise no means either to prevent the cruisers of Tripoli from putting to sea, or our merchant ships from passing up the Mediterranean, unarmed and without convoy. Is it not possible to prohibit them (for their own sakes) from coming past Gibraltar unless armed sufficiently to defend themselves, when three or four are together, or under convoy of some of our ships of war."

"The Bashaw of Tripoli seems disposed to enter into a treaty with us, but upon what terms he has not yet declared; Mr. Eaton informs me that a proposition of peace on the part of the Bashaw of Tripoli came through the Bey of Tunis, when it was proposed that the latter should be mediator and guarantee. Mr. Eaton answered that we prefer peace to war when we can obtain it upon honorable terms, but not otherwise."

From No. 9, dated

"LEGHORN, July 15, 1802.

"On the 10th instant, Mr. Appleton and myself endeavored to dissuade the masters of vessels, now in port, from sailing, until some of our frigates, or those of Sweden, arrive to take them under convoy, but without effect; they seem, at present, as they ever have seemed, intent upon gain only, without properly appreciating the risk."

CIRCULAR.

ALGIERS, June 26, 1802.

This morning arrived a Tripoline corsair, and with her a prize; the Philadelphia brig Franklin, Captain Morris, who sailed from Marseilles the 8th instant, was captured the 15th instant adjacent to Carthagena, and another American brig, which was in company, got off.

On the morning of the 21st instant, I saw, three leagues east of Algiers, another Tropoline cruiser, with a brig in her possession, standing to the eastward, which I take to be an American vessel. I am trying on what terms I can obtain the ransom of Captain Morris and crew, in all, nine; and, if possible, afterwards shall see on what conditions I can get the brig and cargo.

It is a fact that there is at sea, at present, six sail of Tripoline cruisers; and it is asserted that the frigates of the United States and those of Sweden are blockading Tripoli.

Sir, I am, &c.

RICH. O'BRIEN.

By comparing this with Mr. Nordeling's letter, it would appear that more cruisers than the two galleys are out; but I can hardly believe it possible that they could evade the diligence of two squadrons, or that they have enterprise to attempt it in any thing but row boats, such as the galleys.

Cathcart, it is reported, heard, but not authenticated by official authority, that Lieutenant Sterrett, in the Enterprise, has recaptured a Swede. God send it may be true.

Extracts of a letter from Andrew Morris, Captain of the brig Franklin, to James Leander Cathcart, Esquire, Consul of the United States, &c. dated

"TRIPOLI, July 22, 1802.

"I take this early opportunity to inform you of my capture. I sailed with the brig Franklin, belonging to Messrs. Summer and Brown, of Philadelphia, from Marseilles, with an assorted cargo for the West Indies, on the 8th ultimo, and, on the night of the 17th following, then off Cape Gallos, was boarded by one of three Tripoline corsairs, mounting four carriage and four swivel guns, that sailed from this place on or about the 20th of May. I shall pass over the occurrences of that night, as you are well acquainted with the conduct of these barbarians towards the unfortunate that fall into their hands. They proceeded with the prize to Algiers, where we arrived the 26th; and, as I conjecture, by the representations of Mr. O'Brien, they were obliged to make a hasty retreat on the 27th following, but not without giving me an additional load of chains; what with calms and contrary winds, we did not reach Biserta, in the neighborhod of Tunis, until the 7th instant; where, after a tarry of five days, we departed, leaving the brig in charge of their agent, and arrived here on the 19th instant. Through the interference of Mr. Nissen, His Danish Majesty's consul here, I have the liberty of the town; and, by a lucky event, a Mr. Benjamin McDonough has claimed my two officers and one seaman, and has obtained their release as British subjects; two more that were foreigners, which I reported as passengers, have likewise been liberated, so that they have only myself and three seamen captives. You will readily agree with me that this will lessen the value of the capture to the Bey. But I cannot pass over the disappointment I experienced in not falling in with some of our vessels of war, during one month's captivity on board the corsair, especially off Cape Bon, a place that the necessity of strictly guarding must appear to every naval commander at war with Tripoli. But more on this subject if time will permit: the most provoking circumstance was off this place: when we had arrived within about five leagues of the port, the corsair, with our flag reversed, began, according to their custom, to salute, and so continued at intervals, for more than five hours, until we anchored in the harbor."

"The three galliots are now all in port; they are to sail immediately; it is said Morad Raiz, alias Lisle, is to go in one of them, or in a small Italian polacre of twelve guns."

Extract of a letter from William Eaton, Esq., Consul of the United States of America, at Tunis, to the Secretary of State, dated

"TUNIS, December 13, 1801.

"On the 28th arrived the Danish Commodore Koefred, and a consul Holch, five days from Leghorn. The evening of the 2d ultimo they passed at the American house. As the commodore had lately been at Tripoli, on a negotiation, it was very natural to inquire of him what seemed to him to be the general sentiment of the Tripolines, respecting the American war. He said it was very unpopular, and that the subjects of the Bashaw, chiefly on this account, were ripe for a revolt; they waited for nothing but succor. They clamor against the madness and oppression of their chiefs; say he makes war on his friends to the destruction of their little commerce; takes all the plunder to himself; and, in the issue, reduces them to starvation and the loss of their friends, without allowing them the wretched consolation to mourn for those friends when slain. He forbade the surviving relations to mourn for Sterrett's dead.

"They almost unanimously desire the restoration of their rightful sovereign, who is a mild man of peaceable dispositions."

Extract of a letter from Richard O'Brien, Esquire, Consul of the United States of America at Algiers, to the Secretary of State.

"ALGIERS, February 1, 1802.

"The Algerine ministry, on the 20th of January, proposed to me, that now, as the Tripoline ambassador was here, to settle or arrange with Tripoli. At the same time alluded that a little money would be required. I answered, I had no orders on this subject; and that I was convinced that the United States would never give any; that we had sufficient of the bad faith of Tripoli. I considered this hint, or proposition, in order to feel my pulse to know if I had orders or latitudes."

Extract of a letter from William Eaton, Esq., Consul of the United States of America at Tunis, to the Secretary of State, dated

"LEGHORN, February 3, 1802.

"It may not be improper to mention here, that Thursday 17th December, latitude 39° 45′, spoke Snow Fox, of Boston, from Naples, bound to Messina, with very few men and no guns. The Mediterranean is covered with this kind of adventurers. If individuals will neither have regard to their own safety, nor the general interests of the United States, should not the Government interdict this loose manner of hazarding both by legal prohibitions to commerce here without convoy? One single merchantman's crew, in chains at Tripoli, would be of incalculable prejudice to the affairs of the United States in that regency."

Extract of a letter from Richard O'Brien, Esq., Consul of the United States at Algiers, to the Secretary of State, dated at

"ALGIERS, June 14, 1802.

"On the evening of the 10th instant arrived here two Tripoline corsairs, and this morning they sailed for the coast of Spain, in search of Americans and Swedes. These two corsairs are row galleys, with three lattine sails, each having four guns; one a crew of forty men, the other thirty-five. They are well calculated for rowing, and boarding vessels in calms or light winds. They say they are about twenty days from Tripoli; sailed with three others; and those two have coasted it down the Barbary shore to Algiers."

JUNE 26.

"This morning, at 6, A. M. entered the port of Algiers a Tripoline corsair, and with her the American brig Franklin, Captain Morris, of Philadelphia, with his crew, nine persons, in chains, on board the Tripoline corsair. The Tripoline corsair had her colors flying at each mast head, and kept firing guns; at the same time, under her prow was hoisted the American flag reversed: all this I [have] seen with my own eyes. On this, I went to the Marine, to the General and Minister for Foreign Affairs; told him, as the treaty of the United States with Tripoli was under the guaranty of this regency, that, if the Dey had not power or influence over the Government, or Bashaw of Tripoli, the Dey had it now in his power, and in his port, and under the eyes of the city, to do me the justice that he had pledged the faith and honor of the regency to do; that I demanded, in the name of the United States, the American brig and cargo, and crew, of this Government; that all was in their port, with the Tripoline corsair; that [she] had been supplied here, from the 10th to the 14th of June, with all her wants, which enabled her to proceed to sea, and capture Americans.

"To this he answered, that the regency's guaranty was intended to be as a mediator, but not to use force; that now the guaranty could not much be talked of; that the United States had sent frigates to blockade Tripoli; had taken last year a Tripoline corsair and crew, and let them go; if we had brought them to Algiers, and given them up to the Dey, that he would again settle our affairs with Tripoli, with a little money or expense. To this I answered, that the regency had been repeatedly solicited to use their influence before that hostilities had commenced; that, when Algiers had any business of their own, it was respected by Tripoli; but when any affairs of the United States, I was told that Algiers had not power to command the Government of Tripoli to act contrary to its interests; that timid, indeed, would the United States be, knowing, for eight months before it had happened, that Tripoli intended a war of plunder on our commerce, that we depended on this regency's guaranty; but to give a greater security, we sent three frigates; to show our moderation, we let go the Tripoline corsair and crew; that this circumstance the regency well knew of. Finally, he told me he could do nothing without first receiving the Dey's orders; that he would remain in my favor all in his power. I had known that this said marine minister had encouraged the Tripolines from the 10th to the 14th of June; that, if they took any prizes, they might bring them into the ports of this regency and dispose of them.

"I declared publicly that the regency's conduct this day was a breach of faith, and of the treaty which they had made and guarantied to the United States. I next went to the prime minister; and stated to him every thing, as I had to the marine minister. He observed that, if the American frigates were not blockading Tripoli, that Algiers would give up the American brig, cargo, and crew, and send the corsairs of Tripoli out of their ports; that, two years past, the Portuguese took an Algerine corsair; that the Bashaw of Tripoli had got from the Portuguese the corsair and crew, and sent both as a present to the Dey; that this great favor to Algiers would be badly repaid by Algiers taking from the Tripolines the American cargo, brig, and crew; that our colors being reversed was a custom of war; that our corsairs could do the same by Tripoli, when we took any of their vessels. I told him the favor rendered by Tripoli to Algiers had nothing to do with their guaranty of the treaty of the United States; that I demanded what was in the power of the regency to perform, and would not forget any service he would render me on this occasion.

"On the morning of the 27th June, I went again to the Minister of the Marine, who informed me that he had stated to the Dey the chief of what I had said to him the day before; that the Dey said Tripoli and the United States were at war; that this finished his guaranty; that the Dey did not think it to be right to take prisoners or prizes from the Tripolines to give to the Americans who were blockading Tripoli; that this was the Dey's answer; that I might take it to my Government: at the same time, that the Dey would admit of American corsairs to the same favors in his ports as he did to the Tripolines. I observed, to this definitive answer of the Dey, I had not much more to say at present than what I had repeatedly stated; that I would fully communicate the same to the Government of the United States, and was sorry to observe that our treaty was only adhered to in such parts as were favorable to this regency, and in no respects, in any manner, to the advantage of the United States. He cautioned me to be prudent; that it was well known to me that a little thing would irritate the Dey, and the consequence would be serious; that I well knew the terms the Dey had lately obliged the Spaniards to acquiesce to; and that both the British and French would soon share the same fate. I thanked him for his advice, and observed that it made no difference to the United States in what Spain acquiesced to, or what the Dey would do against the British or French; that I was convinced the Government of the United States would, with regret, learn, from facts, that Algiers was not the friend of the United States, but an evident friend of Tripoli. He observed that he did not believe that we, or any Christian nation, would keep the peace with Algiers, if we found it more our interest to be at war. I told him that we knew our interest, and, at the same time, would not sacrifice the honor of our nation under any consideration whatever; that the present time admitted of a favorable opportunity for him, the Dey, &c. to do me the just favor I required.

"The prime minister, and Brurach, the Dey's Jew broker, and in fact his principal director, went to the Dey at 2, P. M. on the day of the 27th of June, and stated all my arguments to the Dey. The same, I sent my dragoman to the Dey, to request the favor to befriend me on the present occasion; that nine of my countrymen were in chained captivity in his port, on board a Tripoline, with a prize, an American brig; and that the corsair of Tripoli had the American flag reversed at the prow of said corsair; that, at the same time, the Dey was the guarantee of the treaty of the United States with Tripoli; that, if the Dey was not occupied, I should be happy to see him on this occasion.

"The Dey answered that I need not come; that he had the whole of the business in his mind, and that I would shortly hear the result.

"On this, the Dey sends a messenger down to the marine, to the Vickelhadge, or General of the Marine, for him to call the Tripoline captain; that the Dey will purchase the nine Americans, brig, and cargo; that the Dey will give for these the sum of five thousand dollars; and that he would write to the Bashaw of Tripoli that this he did, and would remit him the money. After the Dey sent this message to the marine, the Dey went to his garden. The Minister of the Marine declared this message to the Tripoline captain; who said he could only part with the American prisoners by force, having the Bashaw of Tripoli's orders, above all things, if he should take any Americans, to take care and land them at some of the outports; that it was by having possession of them that his master, the Bashaw, would find thereby means to bring the Americans to a peace on Tripoli terms.

"At mid-day, on the 28th of June, being informed that several Moorish merchants were offering to purchase the brig Franklin and cargo from the captain of the Tripoline; on this information I went to the prime minister, and told him what I heard; he was very angry; said that the business should have been carried yesterday, agreeable to the Dey's orders, but that the business was in the hands of a lion, (the Dey,) and that the foxes were looking on, alluding to the Moorish merchants. Shortly after this, I heard that the agent of Tripoli went to the Dey, and also the Swedish dragoman; that the Dey got very angry, and ordered both the Tripoline corsairs and their prize, the American brig, to depart the port of Algiers directly. As they were getting under way, I went to the Minister of the Marine, and told him that this conduct of Algiers was as a friend to Tripoli, and not to the United States; that it was in his power to have done me justice, and that he neglected it. He said he was to obey the Dey's orders; that we should have kept a better look out, and not let the corsairs of Tripoli get out. I observed to this, that I was trying to remedy the evil, &c.; had I had his sincere assistance, the business would have been finished yesterday; that, at present, I had only to detail the whole affair to my Government; the result he would be informed of; and that, as Tripoli corsairs thus entered with American prizes into the ports of this regency, that certainly American frigates would frequent this coast, and difficulties would ensue.

"The Tripoline corsairs, and brig Franklin, and Captain Morris and crew, left Algiers on the 28th of June, at half past 2, P. M. with a light westerly wind, destined to the eastward, I suppose for Bona or Tunis, where, I hope, they will meet one of our frigates. It seems now to be reduced to a certainty that there are but those two Tripoline corsairs at sea."

Extract of a letter from James Simpson, Consul of the United States for the Kingdom of Morocco, to the Secretary of State, dated

"TANGIER, January 8, 1802.

"At this time, Muley Solyman has not a single vessel of war afloat. At Sallee, two frigates, of about twenty guns, are building, and may probably be launched next spring; but he is in want of many stores for them ere they can be sent to sea. At Tetuan, they have lately patched up an old half galley to carry two bow guns and fifty men; but, if I am to judge from her appearance last May, she is scarce fit to go to sea. This is all the navy.

"When Muley Solyman requested I would procure for his use the mentioned one hundred gun carriages, he particularly mentioned they would be paid for on delivery at this port, as advised in No. 33. I was in hopes Mr. Bulkley might have been able to contract for them, payable in that way; but he acquainted me they must be paid for in Lisbon; and that he judged they might cost about three hundred and twenty millreas each. Highly desirous of gratifying His Majesty, and having no other means of providing for payment of these carriages, I proposed drawing for the sum that might be required on account of my salary. This, I trust, on your side, will be admitted as a proof that nothing in my power to do, on this occasion, has been wanting, notwithstanding what the Emperor and his ministers may suppose. Should Government think well of making the Emperor of Morocco a present, at this time, as a fresh proof of the friendship of the United States, (in the event of his continuing the peace uninterrupted, as I trust will be the case,) these carriages, in my opinion, would be more acceptable to him than any thing else. In that case, it will be necessary to give Mr. Bulkley directions respecting the payment of them. Should this measure be determined on, I would, with due submission, beg leave to recommend a letter being sent by the President to the Emperor, on the occasion; especially as, since the recognition of the treaty, in 1795, and his letter of the 18th August, that year, no direct communication whatever has been made to His Majesty on the part of the United States.

"The Tripoline ambassador, or messenger, come from thence so long ago, was permitted, on Saturday last, to proceed for Fez, to meet the Emperor. This man's business, in this country, is not precisely known, but will soon be, after he may have an interview with Muley Solyman.

"On Monday, the 14th ultimo, the Bashaw sent for me; and, after making his secretary and other attendants retire, he told me Muley Solyman was much displeased at my not having obtained for him the gun carriages he had commissioned; adding that the reasons I had alleged, in my last letter to the Emperor, on the subject, were by no means satisfactory, as they appeared to him to be merely excuses. Conscious that I had said nothing but what Mr. Bulkley had written me, on the part of the carpenter at Lisbon, who had offered to contract to make these carriages, I felt perfectly easy on the occasion, and endeavored to convince the Bashaw that the motive alleged for His Majesty's displeasure was groundless, of which he, at least, seemed to be satisfied. He then said he was also instructed by His Majesty to demand whether I was authorized to make him presents of moment, from time to time. I answered that in the treaty made between Sidi Mahomet and the United States of America, and confirmed by Muley Solyman, no stipulation whatever was made for my Government making presents, at any stated periods; of consequence, that I was without any instructions on that subject. The Bashaw then told me Muley Solyman looked upon the Americans as no better friends to him than the Dutch; and that I must consider myself in the same situation as their consul was at that day. Fully satisfied that the Government of the United States had given the most ample and unequivocal proofs of friendship to Muley Solyman, I readily saw that this intimation must proceed either from error, or that it was a prelude to His Majesty's making another attempt to get quit of the treaty of 1786, and obtain presents at stipulated periods. On this occasion, I beg to refer you to the several letters I had the honor of addressing the Department of State, from Rhabat, between the 15th July and 18th August, 1795, and to No. 55 of my Gibraltar correspondence, dated 24th September, same year. By these, you will see a strong attempt to effect this was at that time made, but that I had the happiness to overcome it, and obtain a recognition of that treaty, under well founded motives, in appearance, for believing Muley Solyman granted it from a full conviction of its being incumbent on him to do so. Bashaw Hackanaway having stated the American and Batavian Governments as standing in the same predicament, in relation to this country, I did not allow him to quit that ground until I had given him an ample detail of the very early attention the United States paid Muley Solyman, urging that, in the choice of the articles [which] chiefly composed their first present, they had given the strongest proof possible of the part they took in His Majesty's concerns at that interesting moment, and of their desire that he should overcome the opposition then actually making against his succession. It does not appear necessary to trouble you with all the other arguments at this interview, only to say that, having desired another, the Bashaw appointed the 16th, in the evening. We accordingly met; and I laid before him an Arabic translation of the treaty of 1786, with a copy of the Emperor's letter of the 18th August, 1795, to the President, confirming it; also, lists of the first and second presents I delivered, in the name of the United States, to Muley Solyman, at Rhabat, in 1795, and of that I had also the honor of delivering at Mequinez, 1798, on the occasion of showing His Majesty my commission as consul. He perused all these papers with attention, and assured me, as in holding these conferences in private, he had given me a proof of his friendship, so I might depend upon experiencing a continuance thereof, and that he would report to His Majesty on the occasion. At this second interview, not a syllable was said on my retiring from the country; neither have I, to this hour, heard any more on that subject."

Extracts from the same to the same, dated

"TANGIER, 20*th February*, 1802.

"I am happy in saying that, up to the present hour, I have not heard a syllable further relative to Bashaw Hackanaway's communications, of the 14th December, from which I draw a very favorable conclusion."

"The Tripoline who went to the Emperor, as ambassador, solicited some cargoes of wheat, and is gone to Rhabat with permission to load; but he certainly will not find vessels to charter whilst Tripoli continues blockaded. The Emperor having also been solicited to give his assistance towards getting the Tripoline brig, which lies at Gibraltar, sent home, consented to give a crew and provisions for that purpose. A few days ago, the Governor solicited from the Swedish consul and myself, in His Majesty's name, passports for her; which, having convinced him it was not in our power to grant, under the actual situation of Tripoli, it was agreed we should write Admiral Ciderstrom and Commodore Dale on the subject, which has been done."

From the same to the same, dated

"MARCH 19, 1802.

"I confirm that Muley Solyman has agreed to allow wheat to be sent from his country to Tripoli; but I should think it to be next to an impossibility for them to find vessels to charter for that voyage, whilst that port is so notoriously known to be blockaded. Whatever may be done in this particular, at any of the Emperor's ports, I shall take care to advise the commanders of the frigates on this station of."

Extracts from the same to the same, dated

"MAY 13, 1802.

"Yesterday I had certain intelligence of the Governor of Rhabat having received His Majesty's orders on the 6th instant for sending a schooner to Darelbeyda, immediately to load wheat for Tripoli."

"On the 2d instant, the two frigates were launched at Rhabat. I am assured they are pierced for twenty-six guns each, on the main deck. If so, they must be much crowded: for no ship, of a suitable length and draught of water, and that force, can enter any of the ports of this empire. Nothing that I yet know of has been done towards obtaining the small cruisers it was said His Majesty intended to station at this port."

From the same to the same, dated

"I have the honor to transmit herewith the copy of No. 39, also translation of the minister's answer to the letter written him on the 25th April, by the Swedish consul and myself, on the subject of His Majesty's desire of sending wheat to Tripoli, by which you will see he submits the propriety of that measure to the letter of the treaties of Sweden and the United States with this country. Unfortunately, neither make any provision for such a case, nor are blockaded ports mentioned in them. Hitherto none of the shipments have taken place.

"Sunday last, the Governor sent for Mr. Wyk and me, to show us a letter from His Majesty, desiring to know if we were yet authorized to grant passports for that wheat and the Tripoline ship lying at Gibraltar, which, of course, was answered in the negative.

"It did not appear he had been instructed to treat with us upon the subject, in the precise terms of the minister's letter. We, however, did not fail to repeat to him, that all sort of intercourse by sea with blockaded ports was pointedly opposite to the law of nations and common usage at this day. This conference was held in the presence of the commodore of the Tripoline ship and one of their ambassador's secretaries, who brought the letter from His Majesty."

"Praise is due to God alone. There is no power or strength but in God. To the consuls, Peter Wyk and Simpson—health.

"Your letter reached the high presence of our master, (whom God preserve!) and I read it to him; also what you say on the subject of a passport for the Tripoline ambassador.

"This wheat to be sent belongs to my master. If you allow it to pass, when the ambassador goes, as the property of His Majesty, it will be very well. If not, you will do what is regular, and as is established by the treaties of peace between us and you.

"The Governor, Hodge Abdarhaman Hasash, will confer with you on this matter. Let what is in the treaties of peace be done.

Extract from James Simpson to the Secretary of State, dated

"JUNE 14, 1802.

"No. 40, concluded 10th instant, and forwarded to Gibraltar, I presume is still there, and that this will go from thence with it.

"I have now the honor to acquaint you, that yesterday the Governor sent for me, to say he had just received a letter from the Emperor, with orders to acquaint me that, since passports could not be granted for the two cargoes of wheat he wished to send to Tripoli, His Majesty had directed the vessels should go to Tunis; which I was happy to hear, as by that means we get rid of what threatened to be a very unpleasant piece of business.

"In the evening, at the request of the Governor, I wrote His Majesty, to explain again the powerful motives why I could not sanction vessels going to Tripoli, but that I was ready to grant the usual certificates for those His Majesty might direct to be laden with cargoes, his property, for Tunis."

Extract from the same to the same, dated

"JUNE 17, 1802.

"It is with great concern I am under the necessity of acquainting you, that, either the information given the Swedish consul and myself on Sunday last, respecting His Imperial Majesty having consented to allow his wheat vessels to go to Tunis, was extremely fallacious on the part of the Governor of Tangier, or the Emperor must speedily have repented of having taken that resolution.

"This morning the Governor sent for me again, to say he had received fresh instructions from His Majesty, with orders to demand from me passports for those vessels to go direct to Tripoli, and, in case of refusal, that I was to quit the country; adding, that the letter was written in such strong terms as must prevent his consenting to any mitigation. After a very long conference, he, at last, however, allowed me time to write to Commodore Morris, at Gibraltar, which I am now about to do fully."

"GIBRALTAR, June 26, 1802.

"Within this, I beg leave to enclose copy of No. 42, and am extremely sorry to add the intelligence of my having been compelled, by the Governor of Tangier, to retire from thence, on Thursday evening, in consequence of positive orders from His Imperial Majesty to that effect, received on the evening of the 22d, accompanied with advice of his having declared war against the United States."

"I had another interview with the Governor of Tangier, when I succeeded in obtaining his promise to suspend again the execution of His Majesty's orders, received on the 16th, for my expulsion, until he could represent to His Majesty the impossibility he was then satisfied had always existed to my granting the required passports, since the commodore could not sanction them."

"I have now to acquaint you that yesterday I received a letter from the Governor of Tangier, dated 30th June, advising that His Imperial Majesty (in answer to the letter he wrote on the 22d) had directed that I might be permitted to remain there six months; adding, that I was, in consequence, at liberty to return to my house in Tangier, or not, as I should see fit."

Extracts of a letter from the same to the same, dated at

"GIBRALTAR, July 16, 1802.

"I have the honor of transmitting with this duplicate of No. 44, also a copy of the letter I wrote the Governor of Tangier, in answer to that I mentioned to have received from him. On same sheet is extract of a letter from the Danish consul at Tangier to me, containing the substance of what the Governor encharged him to communicate, by way of reply to my letter to him; all which I beg leave to submit to your perusal.

"In constant hope of seeing the Adams, upon mature consideration, I thought, as I had been expelled the country, and the alarm given of danger to the American flag, it was best to wait her arrival, and receipt of the instructions I fully depend on receiving by that ship, before I closed with the Governor's proposal of returning to Tangier, or entirely reject it. By this I was guided in the answer I gave to his letter, and it is satisfactory to see the determination meets his entire approbation."

"My friend at Rhabat writes me, under 25th July, that the equipment of the two frigates there goes on but slowly. At Tetuan I find they make all despatch with the two galleys, and that this day week, guns, anchors, and cables were sent from Tangier by a Moor's boat for them."

Copy of a letter from James Simpson, Esq., Consul of the United States, &c. for the kingdom of Morocco, to the Governor of Tangier, dated at GIBRALTAR, July 5, 1802.

SIR:

I have received your excellency's letter of the 29th last moon, advising me His Imperial Majesty Muley Solyman had been pleased to direct that I might remain in Tangier six months. Had that order reached you previous to my being compelled to retire from His Majesty's dominions, I should certainly have availed of it. The frigate we expected from America has not yet reached this place. The moment she arrives, I will do myself the honor of writing His Imperial Majesty; and, in the mean time, I beg you will be fully assured my best endeavors will continue to be exerted for a renewal of peace and good friendship between His Imperial Majesty and America.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Shausbor, Danish Consul General, to James Simpson, Esq., the American Consul, dated

"TANGIER, July 9, 1802.

"Your esteemed favor of the 5th instant is duly come to hand, with the enclosed letter for the Governor of this place. I delivered it in his own hand, and, according to your request, explained to him the contents of it. In answer, he desires me to tell you, that he found you were in the right, and that he would not neglect, by the first opportunity, to inform His Majesty that he had written to you a very good letter, and that he has got still a better answer."

Extracts from James Simpson to the Secretary of State, dated at

"TANGIER, July 27, 1802.

"I had the honor to receive, by Captain Campbell, of the Adams, the letter you wrote me on the 30th April, to which I must pray you will excuse my replying at length this morning. It was considered by Commodore Morris and myself proper that I should pass over to this place, for the purpose of more speedily and effectually making the communications you encharged me with for His Imperial Majesty, on part of the President."

"In the mean time, I have to acquaint you that the frigate at Larach lies quite ready for sea, and that her commander left this place on Sunday, fully authorized to capture American vessels."

From the same to the same, dated at

"TANGIER, August 3, 1802.

"The 27th last month, I had the honor of addressing No. 46 to you, with advice of my return to this country; original was sent Commodore Morris, and duplicate via Lisbon. Last night I returned from Tetuan, after having had an interview with Hodge Abdarhaman Hasash, who confirmed to me that the ship mentioned to be ready at Larach was destined to detain American vessels as well as others, and showed me His Majesty's original letter, written by himself, authorizing Hasash to give directions to the captain for that effect; the ship to be placed entirely under his direction."

"Hasash did not long hesitate ere he proposed to withdraw the authority he had given for the Larach ship taking Americans, provided I would grant the captain the usual certificates given by consuls to the Emperor's cruisers, that he might put to sea; but that I positively refused, or to sanction any vessel whatever belonging to the Emperor going to sea in any degree armed, until such time as His Majesty should see proper to give the most positive declaration of his being at peace as heretofore with the United States. After many arguments on both sides, Hasash promised me he would recommend to His Majesty to desist from his hostile intentions against the United States."

"Accordingly, it was agreed both he and I should immediately write His Majesty; and, enclosed with this, I have the honor of transmitting a copy of my letter, which I beg you will be good enough to lay before the President, together with this despatch, for his information on what has been done. At this moment, I have the highest gratification in saying I enjoy great hopes of a speedy accommodation; but, at the same time, although I have the conscious satisfaction of knowing that every exertion possible in my power has been made by paving the way for it, even during the time I was at Gibraltar, by endeavoring to gain my friends near the Emperor over to our interest; yet, I must candidly say, had there not been a naval force at hand to keep their cruisers in port, I very much doubt if all I could have done would have been attended with that success I now so much hope for."

"TETUAN, July 31, 1802.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

"With all due respect and deference, I beg leave to write your Imperial Majesty this letter, and to express my sincere wish it may meet your Majesty in the enjoyment of perfect health, which I pray God long to continue.

"After having retired from your Majesty's dominions, in consequence of your orders communicated to me for that effect, by your servant Hodge Abdarhaman Hasash, it is with the highest satisfaction I have returned for the purpose of laying before your Majesty the contents of a letter received from the Secretary of State of the United States of America, replete with expressions of the respect and particular regard the President of the said United States entertains towards your Majesty.

"That letter was written on the 30th day of April, corresponding with the 28th Dulhajja of last year. I have it in particular charge thereby to assure your Imperial Majesty, in the name of the President, how very highly he regards your Majesty's faithful observance of the peace established between your royal father (who is in glory) and the United States. The interruption that has happened since that letter was written, I trust I may be allowed to hope will speedily be done away.

"I further beg leave to represent to your Majesty, that, having found it impossible to obtain from Europe the one hundred gun carriages your Majesty was pleased last year to desire I would endeavor to provide for you, (as I had the honor of advising your Majesty at that time,) it became my duty to represent that disappointment to the Government I serve. The President, desirous of giving your Majesty a proof of his friendship, immediately directed that one hundred gun carriages, such as your Majesty desired me to procure, should be made, and sent by a vessel to Tangier, for your Majesty's use, so soon as they could be finished. Although the great distance of America from this country necessarily occasions considerable delay to answers on any subject submitted from hence, and, of consequence, that this determination of the President has been long in reaching your Majesty, yet I fully persuade myself your Majesty will see, in his ready attention to send to your Majesty what appeared would be acceptable, a strong proof of the sincere intention of the Government of the United States faithfully to maintain, not only peace, but the strictest friendship and good harmony with your Majesty.

"I purpose waiting at Tangier to receive such answer as your Majesty shall be pleased to order to be written to this letter, in full reliance your Majesty will now be pleased to show equally friendly sentiments towards the United States, and issue orders for annulling the declaration of war made against them, that peace may be restored, and their ships of war stationed in these seas again respect, in all cases, your Majesty's flag.

"In fulfilling my duty, by making these friendly communications on the part of the Government of the United States, I beg your Majesty will be persuaded I have sincere satisfaction, since it has ever been, and shall ever be, my constant endeavor to promote peace, harmony, and good friendship between this country and America.

"I pray the Almighty God to preserve your Majesty many years in health and prosperity, and beg leave to subscribe myself, with the highest respect and veneration, may it please your Majesty, your Majesty's most obedient and devoted humble servant,

"JAMES SIMPSON."

"Sheriff, Emperor of Fez, &c."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Simpson to the Secretary of State, dated at

"TANGIER, 12*th August*, 1802.

"Original of No. 47 was forwarded by way of Lisbon, duplicate and triplicate under cover of Mr. Gavino at Gibraltar, each accompanied by a copy of the letter I wrote the Emperor from Tetuan.

"I have now the honor of enclosing, with this translation of the answer I received last night to that letter, by which I am concerned to find new ground taken, likely to be productive of some trouble with His Imperial Majesty. A great consolation is, that the pretension of frequent embassies is totally founded in error: for no such arrangement, as is pretended, was made by me with the late minister Sidi Mahomet Ben Ottoman; nor has any thing of that nature ever been moved or hinted at, since the period alluded to, namely, 1795."

[TRANSLATION.]

TANGIER, 12*th August*, 1802.

In the name of the merciful God: there is no power or force but that proceeding from the Great and Most High God.

To JAMES SIMPSON, Consul of America.

Your letter reached the high presence of our master (whom God preserve!) and he was thereby informed of the orders you had received from the American nation.

Our master's pleasure is, that you return to your house; and he has given his orders accordingly, that you may remain, as you have hitherto been, in the exercise of your office, and herewith goes the order for that effect to Alcayde Abdarhaman Hasash: so return to your house. His Majesty also orders me to acquaint you that he still adheres to what you stipulated with Sidi Mahomet Ben Ottoman, (to whom God be merciful!) which is, that your nation shall send each year one of your people to the high presence of our master with your present; but if it be difficult for you to come every year, by reason of the distance of your country, you will come once in every two years.

Upon this the convention with your nation was made and the treaties signed. If you abide by this agreement and fulfil it, you will be as you were, and your attentions will increase our friendship; and if you do not fulfil it, you will see how you will have to settle your matters. What has happened to you now has been occasioned by your own tardiness and neglect in this particular; but our master (whom God preserve!) now forgives all that, and do you on your part as justice directs, and God will assist you.

Written by order of our master (whom the Almighty God has exalted!) on the seventh of Rabii á Tany, 1217, (corresponding with the 6th August, 1802,) by his servant Mahomed Ben Absalem Selaway. Exchanged with the affairs of foreign nations, whom God purify of his sins. Amen.

From No. 49 to the Secretary of State, dated

"TANGIER, 3*d September*, 1802.

"With this I have the honor of transmitting a copy of the letter I wrote the minister on the 1st instant. It will afford me much satisfaction to know what I have said on the subject of the Emperor's pretension meets the approbation of his excellency the President. I have stated only facts, and thought best to reserve copies of my letter of the 18th July, 1795, to the then minister, and that of Muley Solyman's to the President, on the 18th of August, following, as vouchers, more proper to be exhibited in support of my arguments, and in opposition to what further may be alleged on the part of this Government, on the subject of what they thought fit to advance rather than now."

"The business of bringing the Tripoline ship from Gibraltar, under the Emperor's flag, has been again agitated, and a general application made by Alcayde Hasash, to the consuls here, for passports for her as belonging to His Majesty, to sail from hence for Tripoli. I positively refused mine in these terms, nor do I find any has been granted; but it is certain men have been ordered from Tetuan for her, and that she is to hoist colors at Gibraltar so soon as the weather will allow these people to get over.

"I have acquainted Captain Campbell, of the Adams frigate, that, in my private opinion, the whole is a colorable business; but if the Emperor announces to the body of the consuls that the ship is his, and demands passports accordingly, merely to go to sea and navigate as his, I really do not see how I dare return to contest the matter; or, from circumstances, to express doubts on what is stated by the sovereign of the country as a fact, without running a great risk of drawing serious resentment on the commerce of the United States."

Extract of a letter from James Simpson, Esq. Consul of the United States, to his excellency Sidi Mahomed Ben Absalem Selaway, Secretary of State, &c.

SIR: I have received the letter you wrote me, in answer to that I had the honor of addressing His Imperial Majesty from Tetuan. In that letter you acquainted me it was His Majesty's pleasure I should remain in this place, and exercise the functions of my office as heretofore, as that the necessary orders had been given for that effect to the Governor Alcayde Abdarhaman Hasash. Very much desirous of seeing perfect harmony subsist between this empire and the United States of America, and, at all times, ready to contribute thereto, as far as is in my power, I did not hesitate at again hoisting their flag on my residence in Tangier, in testimony of the return of peace, and notified to his excellency the President His Majesty's friendly dispositions in this particular.

I also gave the necessary information on the subject to the commanding officer of the American ships of war stationed in their seas, and granted passports for His Majesty's frigate Mirboha and schooner Miribha, that they might put to sea, and navigate in safety.

I beg you will have the goodness to represent these matters to His Imperial Majesty, with an assurance from me, that he will always experience from the Government of the United States and their agents an equal readiness to correspond with every disposition His Majesty may be pleased to show for maintaining an uninterrupted peace between the two nations. At the same time, speaking with that sincerity [which] ought to guide the representatives of nations, I cannot help expressing to you with what surprise and concern I observe the further communication you make me by order of His Imperial Majesty, stating his expectation of annual embassies, accompanied with presents from the United States of America. You are pleased to say it was so stipulated with the late Sidi Mahomet Ben Ottoman.

I beg you will tell me where, and by whom, such engagement was made, for I am a perfect stranger to it.

What I know of the matter is, that, in the year 1795, when I had the honor of being sent by the Government of the United States to His Imperial Majesty Muley Solyman at Rhabat, for the purpose of congratulating him on his happy accession to the throne of his ancestors, and for obtaining a recognition of the treaty made at Morocco, between His Majesty's father, Sidi Mahomet Ben Abdallah, and the United States of America, His Majesty was pleased to ratify that treaty, without any addition or alteration, in fulfilment of his father's engagement, made in the name of the Almighty, that it should continue in full force for fifty years from the first day of Rhamaden, in the year 1300, on which it was signed.

His Majesty's letter on that occasion to the President of the United States, bearing date the 2d of Fafar, 1310, was delivered by me to Sidi Mahomet Ben Ottoman, and declared that His Majesty was at peace, tranquillity, and friendship with America, in the same manner as his father (who is with God) was, to which the Government of the United States have ever faithfully corresponded.

By that treaty there is no stipulation whatever for embassies being sent, or presents made, by either the one Government or the other, as you will see by the copy of it in Arabic, I delivered to Sidi Mohamet Ben Ottoman, on the 12th July, 1795, at Rhabat. I have seen it my duty to transmit to the Government, I have the honor to represent in this country, three several copies of your letter on this important subject, by different conveyances, to guard against miscarriage; and I wait to receive such orders as his excellency the President shall see fit to give me on this occasion.

I have lately received information that two seamen, part of the crew of the American ship stranded three years ago near Cape Nun, have escaped from the Arabs, and are now with the Governor of Tawdaunt. I have to request you will have the goodness to transmit me a letter to that gentleman directing him to allow these unfortunate people to proceed to Mogadore, in order that my agent there, Mr. Peter Guyer, may send them to their own country. Alcayde Hasash having signified to me His Majesty's wish to be provided with some more American rice, I have given the necessary directions to the consul at Gibraltar to send me a supply, as soon as he can get any of a quality proper for His Majesty's use.

It will at all times afford me particular pleasure to obey such commands from His Majesty.

I avail of this opportunity of renewing my assurances of respect, and beg you will be persuaded I am, &c.

Extract of a letter from Consul Simpson to Consul Gavino, dated

"TANGIER, 27*th September*, 1802.

"I am happy to tell you that some matters in discussion with this country have already been so far explained, and misconceptions on the part of this Government done away, as leaves me no room to apprehend longer a necessity of having recourse to America for instructions, as every matter is in the fairest train of perfect accommodation, and I hope the gun carriages will come just in time to settle every thing, at least for some years, until they think of something else to ask for."

7th CONGRESS.] No. 176. [2d SESSION.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 22 AND 30, 1802.

DECEMBER 22, 1802.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with the information requested in your resolution of the 17th instant.

In making this communication, I deem it proper to observe that I was led by the regard due to the rights and interests of the United States, and to the just sensibility of the portion of our fellow-citizens more immediately affected by the irregular proceeding at New Orleans, to lose not a moment in causing every step to be taken which the occasion claimed from me; being equally aware of the obligation to maintain, in all cases, the rights of the nation, and to employ, for that purpose, those just and honorable means which belong to the character of the United States.

TH: JEFFERSON.

Report of the Secretary of State to the President of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 21, 1801.

The Secretary of State, to whom the resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States of the 17th instant was referred by the President, has the honor to enclose to him the letters and communications annexed, from the Governor of the Mississippi territory, the Governor of Kentucky, and from William E. Hulings, formerly appointed vice consul of the United States at New Orleans. In addition to this information on the subject of the resolution, it is stated, from other sources, that, on the 29th of October, American vessels from sea remained under the prohibition to land their cargoes; and that the American produce carried down the Mississippi could be landed only on paying a duty of six per cent.; with an intimation that this was a temporary permission. Whether, in these violations of treaty, the officer of Spain at New Orleans has proceeded with or without orders from his Government, cannot as yet be decided by direct and positive testimony; but it ought not to be omitted in the statement here made, that other circumstances concur with the good faith and friendship otherwise observed by His Catholic Majesty, in favoring a belief that no such orders have been given.

JAMES MADISON.

NEW ORLEANS, October 18, 1802.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose you an extract from a decree this day published by the Intendant of the province of Louisiana, by which you will see that the Americans are no longer permitted to deposit their merchandise in this city. No information of any other place being appropriated for an American deposit is yet given; nor have we any reason to hope that the Government has such place in view. The season for the cotton from the Natchez, and other produce from the settlements higher up, to come down, approaches. The difficulties and risks of property that will fall on the citizens of the United States, if deprived of their deposit, are incalculable; their boats being so frail, and so subject to be sunk by storms, that they cannot be converted into floating stores, to wait the arrival of sea vessels to carry away their cargoes.

The port is also this day shut against all foreign commerce, which can only be carried on by Spanish subjects, in Spanish bottoms. I am, sir, with the greatest respect,

WM. E. HULINGS.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Extract from a publication made October 16, 1802, by Juan Ventura Morales, Intendant of the Province of Louisiana, &c.

N. B. The preceding part of the publication relates only to the ratification of peace, and the shutting of the port against foreign trade.

[TRANSLATION.]

"As long as it was necessary to tolerate the commerce of neutrals which is now abolished, it would have been prejudicial to the province, had the Intendant, in compliance with his duty, prevented the deposit in this city, of the property of the Americans, granted to them by the twenty-second article of the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of the 27th October, 1795, during the limited term of three years.

"With the publication of the ratification of the treaty of Amiens, and the re-establishment of the communication between the English and Spanish subjects, that inconvenience has ceased. Considering that the twenty-second article of the said treaty takes from me the power of continuing the toleration which necessity required; since, after the fulfilment of the said term, this ministry can no longer consent to it without an express order of the King: therefore, and without prejudice to the exportation of what has been admitted in proper time, I order, that from this date, the privilege which the Americans had of importing and depositing their merchandise and effects in this capital, shall be interdicted: and, that the foregoing may be publicly known, and that nobody may allege ignorance, I order it to be published in the usual places, copies to be posted up in the public sitioes; and that the necessary notice be given of it to the officers of finance, the administrator of rents, and otherwise, as may be necessary.

"The present being given under my hand, and countersigned by the underwritten notary of finance pro tempore, in the office of Intendancy of New Orleans, October 16, 1802.

"JUAN VENTURA MORALES.

"By order of the Intendant: "PEDRO PEDESCLAUX."

Faithfully translated from the Spanish language, JACOB WAGNER,
Chief Clerk Department of State.

SIR: Near NATCHEZ, October 29, 1802.

I have the honor to enclose you a letter which I last evening received from Mr. Wm. E. Hulings, together with a translation of an extract from a publication made by Juan Ventura Morales, Intendant of the province of Louisiana, &c. dated October 16th, 1802. These despatches announce that the port of New Orleans is shut against foreign commerce, and also the American deposit.

Not understanding from the Intendant's proclamation, whether or not another place on the banks of the Mississippi had been assigned by His Catholic Majesty, (in conformity to our treaty with Spain,) for "an equivalent establishment," I have, by letter, (a copy of which is enclosed,) requested information upon this point, from the Governor General of the province of Louisiana: when his answer is received it shall be forwarded to you.

This late act of the Spanish Government at Orleans has excited considerable agitation at Natchez and its vicinity. It has inflicted a severe wound on the agricultural and commercial interests of this territory, and will prove no less injurious to all the Western country.

There being at present an interruption in the post between this territory and Tennessee, and supposing it of importance that the Government should be early apprised of the late event at Orleans, I have forwarded this letter by express to Nashville, where it will be deposited in the mail.

I am, sir, with sentiments of esteem and respect, your humble servant,

WILLIAM C. C. CLAIBORNE.

The Hon. the SECRETARY OF STATE of the United States.

SIR: NEW ORLEANS, October 18, 1802.

I have to announce to you that this day the port is shut against foreign commerce, and not against foreign commerce only, but against the American deposit in this city. In the decree posted up in the public places, no mention is made of any other place appointed for a deposit. You will use this information as you may think proper.

I am, with great respect, your most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM E. HULINGS.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE, Governor Mississippi Territory.

SIR: NATCHEZ, October 28, 1802.

I was this day informed that, in a proclamation issued on the 16th instant by the Intendant of the province of Louisiana, it was announced, "That the citizens of the United States should no longer be permitted to deposit their merchandises and effects in the port of New Orleans."

Information of an event so immediately interesting to the citizens of the United States led me to peruse attentively "the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, between the United States of America and the King of Spain," and, upon adverting to the twenty-second article, I found it expressly declared, that "His Catholic Majesty will permit the citizens of the United States, for the space of three years from this time, to deposit their merchandises and effects in the port of New Orleans, and to export them from thence, without paying any other duty than a fair price for the hire of the stores; and His Majesty promises either to continue this permission, if he finds, during that time, that it is not prejudicial to the interest of Spain, or, if he should not agree to continue it then, he will assign to them, on another part of the banks of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment." I have here quoted the words of the treaty, and find them too explicit to require comment, or to admit of a doubtful construction.

If, therefore, His Catholic Majesty has discontinued his permission to the citizens of the United States to deposit their merchandises and effects at the port of New Orleans, will your excellency be good enough to inform me whether any, and what, other place on the banks of the Mississippi has been assigned (in conformity to the treaty) for "an equivalent establishment." The subject of this inquiry is so interesting to the commerce of the United States and to the welfare of her citizens, that I must request your excellency to favor me with an early answer.

Accept assurances of my great respect and high consideration.

W. C. C. CLAIBORNE.

His Excellency MANUEL DE SALVADO,
Governor General of the province of Louisiana.

The Governor of Kentucky to the President of the United States.

STATE OF KENTUCKY, FRANKFORT, November 30, 1802.

SIR: Two days ago, I received the enclosed letters from Dr. James Speed, and Meeker and Co., from New Orleans, together with a copy of a proclamation issued by Juan Ventura Morales, Intendant of the Spanish Government of Louisiana, and which I do myself the honor to enclose, for your information. The citizens of this State are very much alarmed and agitated, as this measure of the Spanish Government will, (if not altered) at one blow, cut up the present and future prosperity of their best interests by the roots. To you, sir, they naturally turn their eyes, and on your attention to this important subject their best hopes are fixed. Permit me to request you will give me information on this business as soon as you can say, with certainty, what we may rely on; and let my solicitude on this occasion be my apology for this request.

With sentiments of respect, &c.

JAMES GARRARD.

DECEMBER 30, 1802.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In addition to the information accompanying my message of the 22d instant, I now transmit the copy of a letter on the same subject, recently received.

TH: JEFFERSON.

WASHINGTON, December 30, 1802.

SIR:

Although an informal communication to the public of the substance of the enclosed letter may be proper for quieting the public mind, yet I refer to the consideration of the House of Representatives, whether a publication of it in form might not give dissatisfaction to the writer, and tend to discourage the freedom and confidence of communications between the agents of the two Governments.

Accept assurances of my high consideration and respect.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF U. S., January 7, 1803.

Resolved, That this House receive, with great sensibility, the information of a disposition in certain officers of the Spanish Government at New Orleans to obstruct the navigation of the river Mississippi, as secured to the United States by the most solemn stipulations:

That, adhering to that humane and wise policy which ought ever to characterize a free people, and by which the United States have always professed to be governed; willing, at the same time, to ascribe this breach of compact to the unauthorized misconduct of certain individuals, rather than to a want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty; and, relying, with perfect confidence, on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive, they will wait the issue of such measures as that department of the Government shall have pursued for asserting the rights and vindicating the injuries of the United States: holding it to be their duty, at the same time, to express their unalterable determination to maintain the boundaries, and the rights of navigation and commerce through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties.

D. LENOX, Agent of the United States of America, residing in Great Britain, for the relief and protection of American seamen.

Extract of a letter from David Lenox, Esq., agent, &c. &c., to the Secretary of State, dated

"MARCH 10th, 1802.

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st of January, in answer to mine of the 12th of October last, requesting the President's permission to return to America. I had, with you, anticipated the discharge of all seamen claiming protection as American citizens, on peace taking place, although not possessed of certificates in the usual form, under the idea that, as men would not be wanted for the navy, this Government would prefer discharging those who might be supposed most dissatisfied with the service; but in this I have been disappointed, as you will perceive by the correspondence which I have had with the Admiralty on the subject, copies of which I do myself the honor to send you enclosed. The impressment of our seamen ceased immediately on the preliminary treaty, but applications continue to be made from men on board ships arriving from foreign stations, and, since my last return to the 1st instant, they amount to ninety-five."

BLANDFORD STREET, 17*th October*, 1801.

SIR:

Peace being established between Great Britain and France, I am extremely anxious to close my official business as soon as possible; and, for this purpose, it appears to me that the most eligible mode will be, to furnish a list of all seamen who have claimed protection as American citizens since my arrival in this country, and are detained on the ground of their having no documents to prove their citizenship. Should no objection arise on the part of this Government, I shall proceed to furnish such list on receiving the decision of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. I beg leave to state that Americans are frequently discharged without any evidence of the wages due to them, which not only subjects them to great inconvenience, but is productive of considerable expense to the United States of America. As I conceive that this is not justified by the general practice in the navy, I have to request that orders may be given, that when men are discharged, they may be furnished with some document stating the sum that may be due to them

With great respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,

D. LENOX.

EVAN NEPEAN, Esq. Admiralty Office.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, 20*th October*, 1801.

SIR:

Having laid before my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty your letter of the 17th inst. proposing, for the reasons therein mentioned, to furnish a list of all seamen who have claimed protections as citizens of America, since your arrival in this country, and are detained on board His Majesty's ships on the ground of their having no documents to prove their citizenship, I have their lordships' commands to acquaint you that they can have no objection to your delivering the list above mentioned, and that they will, in all future discharges of American seamen, direct the commanders of the ships in which they served, to certify the time of service of each man, and the amount of charges which are to be deducted from the wages due to him.

I am, sir, your most humble servant,

EVAN NEPEAN.

DAVID LENOX, Esq.

BLANDFORD STREET, 23*d October*, 1801.

SIR:

I do myself the honor to send you enclosed a list of five hundred and fifty-eight seamen, representing themselves to be citizens of the United States of America, and detained on board His Britannic Majesty's fleets, for whose discharge I made application at the dates annexed to their names, and to which answers were returned stating that, having no documents to prove their citizenship, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty could not consent to their discharge. You will readily perceive, sir, that my object in furnishing this list is with a view to the discharge of these men, to which I flatter myself their lordships will not object; and my hopes arise from the idea that, as peace has taken place, men are not now wanted for the navy. I will freely confess that I believe many of them are British subjects; but I presume that all of them were impressed from American vessels, and by far the greater proportion are American citizens, who, from various causes, have been deprived of their certificates of protection, and who, from their peculiar situation, have been unable to obtain proofs from America. Under this impression, I hope their lordships will grant my request, rather than keep in the navy a number of men who will always be dissatisfied with their situation. Should I be so fortunate as to succeed in this application, I shall close my official business in a way perfectly to my satisfaction, and shall not deem it necessary to remain here much longer; but, at any rate, I shall soon return to America, having already requested permission from the American Government for that purpose.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

D. LENOX.

EVAN NEPEAN, Esq. Admiralty Office.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, 26*th October*, 1801.

SIR:

I have received and communicated to my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, your letter to Mr. Nepean of the 23d inst. enclosing a list of five hundred and fifty-eight seamen, representing themselves to be citizens of the United States of America, detained on board His Majesty's ships, whose discharge has been refused, in consequence of their having no documents to prove their citizenship, and requesting, on the ground of their services being no longer wanted, that they may, notwithstanding, be discharged; and I have their lordships' commands to acquaint you that, as the several cases of these men were duly inquired into at the periods of your making application for them, when no sufficient reasons appeared to induce their lordships to believe that they were other than British subjects, (all who could furnish proof to the contrary having been discharged from time to time, as the reports were received,) and, as the admission of the principle that a man declaring himself to belong to a foreign State should, upon that assertion merely, and without direct or very strong circumstantial proof, be suffered to leave the service, would be productive of the most dangerous consequences to His Majesty's navy, or that of any other Power, they cannot comply with your request for the discharge of the men specified in the said list, nor admit even the presumption of their being American citizens, although they shall be disposed at all times to pay the most candid attention to such fair claims and well authenticated documents as may hereafter be brought forward in their behalf.

It is with much pleasure that, in further obedience to their lordships' commands, I express to you the sense they entertain of the able and satisfactory manner in which the business of your Department has been uniformly conducted.

I am your most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM MARSDEN.

DAVID LENOX, Esq.

Extract of a letter from D. Lenox, Esq., agent, &c. to the Secretary of State, dated

"LONDON, May 20, 1802.

"My letter of the 10th of March would advise you that I was preparing to return to the United States, and that I expected to embark some time in this month. I conceived that the best mode of closing my official business was to fix a day to pass to my successor the detail of it, as some time would necessarily be required for answers to be returned from the Admiralty. I accordingly delivered to Mr. Ewing, on the 1st instant, a list of five hundred and ninety-seven seamen, where answers have been returned to me, stating that, having no documents to prove their citizenship, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty could not consent to their discharge. My object in furnishing this list was to prevent a repetition of applications to the Admiralty, which would not only have proved fruitless, but been attended with considerable trouble and embarrassment to Mr. Ewing. I have, however, little doubt but that most of those men have already been discharged. By the abstract which I have now the honor to send you enclosed, you will perceive that only seven cases of seamen remain unanswered, and those I am promised as soon as circumstances will admit; but if they should not be received before I embark, I shall deliver a list of them to Mr. Ewing."

DAVID GELSTON, Collector.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 178. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE AND SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 11, 1803.

JANUARY 11, 1803.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France, and perhaps of the Floridas, and the late suspension of our right of deposit at New Orleans, are events of primary interest to the United States. On both occasions, such measures were promptly taken, as were thought most likely amicably to remove the present, and to prevent future causes of inquietude. The objects of these measures were to obtain the territory on the left bank of the Mississippi and eastward of that, if practicable, on conditions to which the proper authorities of our country would agree; or, at least, to prevent any changes which might lessen the secure exercise of our rights. While my confidence in our minister plenipotentiary at Paris is entire and undiminished, I still think that these objects might be promoted by joining with him a person sent from hence directly, carrying with him the feelings and sentiments of the nation, excited on the late occurrence, impressed by full communications of all the views we entertain on this interesting subject, and thus prepared to meet and to improve, to a useful result, the counter-propositions of the other contracting party, whatsoever form their interests may give to them, and to secure to us the ultimate accomplishment of our object.

I therefore nominate Robert R. Livingston to be minister plenipotentiary, and James Monroe to be minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary, with full powers to both, jointly, or to either, on the death of the other, to enter into a treaty or convention with the First Consul of France, for the purpose of enlarging, and more effectually securing, our rights and interests in the river Mississippi, and in the territories eastward thereof.

But as the possession of these provinces is still in Spain, and the course of events may retard or prevent the cession to France being carried into effect, to secure our object, it will be expedient to address equal powers to the Government of Spain also, to be used only in the event of its being necessary.

I therefore nominate Charles Pinckney to be minister plenipotentiary, and James Monroe, of Virginia, to be minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary, with full powers to both, jointly, or to either, on the death of the other, to enter into a treaty or convention with His Catholic Majesty, for the purpose of enlarging and more effectually securing our rights and interests in the river Mississippi, and in the territories eastward thereof.

TH: JEFFERSON.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 179. [2d SESSION.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JANUARY 11, 1803.

JANUARY 11, 1803.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The spoliations and irregularities committed on our commerce during the late war, by subjects of Spain, or by others deemed within her responsibility, having called for attention, instructions were accordingly given to our minister at Madrid to urge our right to just indemnifications, and to propose a convention for adjusting them. The Spanish Government listened to our proposition with an honorable readiness, and agreed to a convention, which I now submit for your advice and consent. It does not go to the satisfaction of all our claims; but the express reservation of our right to press the validity of the residue has been made the ground of further instructions to our minister, on the subject of an additional article, which it is to be hoped will not be without effect.

TH: JEFFERSON.

A Convention between His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, for the indemnification of those who have sustained losses, damages, or injuries, in consequence of the excesses of individuals of either nation, during the late war, contrary to the existing treaty, or the laws of nations.

Deseando Su Magestad Catolica y el gobierno de los Estados Unidos de America ajustar amistosamente las demandas que han ocasionado los excesos cometidos durante la ultima guerra por individuos de una y otra nacion, contra el derecho de gentes ó el tradado existente entre los dos paises; ha dado Su Magestad Catolica plenos poderes á est efecto á Don Pedro Cevallos, se consejero de estado, gentilhombre de camara con exercicio, primer secretario de estado y del despacho universal, superintendente general de correos y postas de Espana é Indias; y el gobierno de los Estados Unidos de America á Don Carlos Pinckney, ciudadano de dichos Estados, y su ministro plenipotenciario cerca de Su Magestad Catolica, quienes han convenido en lo siguiente:

1°. Se formará una junta compuesta de cinco vocales de los quales, dos serán nombrados por Su Magestad Catolica, otros dos por el gobierno de los Estados Unidos, y el quinto de comun consentimiento; y en el caso de no poderse convenir en el sugeto para quinto vocal, nombrará uno cada parte dexando la eleccion entre los dos a la suerte, y se procederá en la misma forma en adelante al nombramiento ulterior de los sugetos que reemplazaren á los que actualmente lo son en los casos de muerte, enfermedad ó precisa ausencia.

His Catholic Majesty and the Government of the United States of America, wishing amicably to adjust the claims which have arisen from excesses committed during the late war, by individuals of either nation, contrary to the laws of nations, or the treaty existing between the two countries: His Catholic Majesty has given, for this purpose, full powers to his excellency Don Pedro Cevallos, counsellor of state, gentleman of the bed-chamber in employment, first secretary of state and universal despatch, and superintendant general of the posts and post offices in Spain and the Indies; and the Government of the United States of America to Charles Pinckney, a citizen of the said States, and their minister plenipotentiary near His Catholic Majesty; who have agreed as follows:

1. A board of commissioners shall be formed, composed of five commissioners, two of whom shall be appointed by His Catholic Majesty, two others by the Government of the United States, and the fifth by common consent; and in case they should not be able to agree on a person for the fifth commissioner, each party shall name one, and leave the decision to lot: and hereafter, in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence, of any of those already appointed, they shall proceed, in the same manner, to the appointment of persons to replace them.

2°. Hecho asi el nombramiento prestará cada uno de los vocales el juramento de examinar, discutir, y sentenciar las demandas sobre que juzgaren con arreglo al derecho de gentes y tratado existente, y con la imparcialidad que dicta la justicia.

3°. Residerán los vocales y celebrerán las juntas en Madrid, en donde en el perfixo termino de diez y ocho meses, contados desde el dia en que se junten, admitirán todas las demandas que á consequencia de esta convencion hicieren tanto los vasallos de Su Magestad Catolica como los cuidadanos de los Estados Unidos de America, que tuviren derecho á reclamar perdidas, danos y perjuicios, en consequencia de los excesos cometidos pór Espanoles y ciudadanos de dichos estados durante la ultima guerra contra el derecho gentes y tratado existente.

4°. Se autoriza por dichas partes contratantes á los vocales para oir y examinar baxo la sancion del juramento qualezquiera puntos concernientos á las referidas demandas y á reciber como digno de fé todo testimonio de cuya autenticidad no puede dudarse con fundamento.

5°. Bastara el acuerdo de tres vocales para que sus sentencias tengan fuerza de irrevocables y sin apelacion tanto por lo que respecta á la justicia de las demandas, como por lo que hace á las cantidades que se adjudicaren por indemnizacion á los demandantes; pues se obligan las partes contratantes á satisfacerlas en especie, sin rebaxa, en las epocas y parages senalados, y baxo las condiciones que se expresaren en las sentencias de la junta.

6°. No haviendo sido posible ahora á dichos plenipotenciarios convenirse en el modo de que la referida junta arbitrase las reclamaciones originadas en consequencia de los excesos de los corsarios, agentes, consules, ó tribunales extrangeros, en los respectivos territorios, que fueren imputables á los dos gobiernos: se han convenido expresamente en que cada gobierno se reserve, como por esta convencion se hace, para si, sus vasallos y cuidadanos respectivamente, todos los derechos que ahora les asistan, y en que promuevan en adelante sus reclamaciones en el tiempo que les acomodare.

7°. La presente convencion no tendrá ningun valor ni efecto hasta que se haya ratificado por las partes contratantes, y se cangearan las ratificaciones lo mas pronto que sea posible.

En fé de lo qual, nosotros los infrascriptos plenipotenciarios, hemos firmado esta convencion y hemos puesto nuestros sellos respectivos.

Hecho en Madrid, a 11 de Agosto, de 1802.

PEDRO CEVALLOS. [L. S.]
CHARLES PINCKNEY. [L. S.]

2. The appointment of the commissioners being thus made, each one of them shall take an oath to examine, discuss, and decide, on the claims, which they are to judge, according to the laws of nations and the existing treaty, and with the impartiality justice may dictate.

3. The commissioners shall meet and hold their sessions in Madrid, where, within the term of eighteen months, (to be reckoned from the day on which they may assemble,) they shall receive all claims which, in consequence of this convention, may be made, as well by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, as by the citizens of the United States of America, who may have a right to demand compensation for the losses, damages, or injuries, sustained by them, in consequence of the excesses committed by Spanish subjects or American citizens.

4. The commissioners are authorized, by the said contracting parties, to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said demands, and to receive, as worthy of credit, all testimony, the authenticity of which cannot reasonably be doubted.

5. From the decisions of the commissioners there shall be no appeal; and the agreement of three of them shall give full force and effect to their decisions, as well with respect to the justice of the claims, as to the amount of the indemnification which may be adjudged to the claimants; the said contracting parties obliging themselves to satisfy the said awards in specie, without deduction, at the times and places pointed out, and under the conditions which may be expressed by the Board of Commissioners.

6. It not having been possible for the said plenipotentiaries to agree upon a mode by which the above mentioned Board of Commissioners should arbitrate the claims originating from the excesses of foreign cruisers, agents, consuls, or tribunals, in their respective territories, which might be imputable to their two Governments, they have expressly agreed that each Government shall reserve (as it does by this convention) to itself, its subjects, or citizens, respectively, all the rights which they now have, and under which they may hereafter bring forward their claims at such times as may be most convenient to them.

7. The present convention shall have no force or effect until it be ratified by the contracting parties, and the ratification shall be exchanged as soon as possible.

In faith whereof, we, the underwritten plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention, and have affixed thereto our respective seals.

Done at Madrid, this 11th day of August, 1802.

CHARLES PINCKNEY. [L. S.]

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esquire, dated

"JUNE 9, 1801.

"The documents and letters belonging to the legation, which you will receive from Colonel Humphreys, will put you in possession of the several subjects remaining unfinished in his hands. These you will pursue into their proper result. You will find that he has been instructed to urge particularly on the Spanish Government redress for such of our citizens as have suffered from captures made by privateers unlawfully cruising out of Spanish ports, and from wrongful condemnations, both by Spanish tribunals, and by decisions of French consuls, within Spanish jurisdiction. In all these cases, it will be your duty to carry on the proper measures in train for obtaining justice. Colonel Humphreys, you will find, thinks that the Spanish Government means to turn us over for redress to the French republic, in all cases where the prizes have been under French commissions, or been condemned by French consuls. You will be at no loss to combat such an idea, by proper arguments drawn from sources in your possession, or within your reach, and by suitable appeals to the principles and motives which ought to direct the conduct of a wise and just Government, more especially towards a nation entertaining the sentiments and observing the conduct which have been experienced by Spain from the United States.

"The spoliations committed on our trade, for which Spain is held responsible, are known to be already of very great amount, and it is to be apprehended that they may not have yet ceased. The documents and information to be obtained from Colonel Humphreys and the consul at Madrid will assist you essentially in forming an idea of the value and extent of them. Hitherto redress has been sought, sometimes in tribunals of justice, sometimes by applications to the Government, and sometimes in both of these modes. Experience has sufficiently shown that neither the one nor the other, nor both, can be relied on for obtaining full justice to our injured citizens. Some other effort, therefore, is due to the sufferers, and, let me add, to the dignity of the United States, which must always feel the insults offered to the rights of individual citizens. The only pacific effort that seems to remain is, that of proposing a joint tribunal, with full powers to investigate and decide all claims for indemnification, which may be presented to it within a reasonable time. The treaty of ——— with Spain, as well as that of 1794 with Great Britain, will furnish at once the motives and a model for such an institution. In general, it must be the most equitable and satisfactory provision for adjusting controversies of such a kind between independent nations, and it may be urged, more particularly, that there is no less reason for extending it to cases subsequent to the Spanish treaty, than there was for applying it to cases of antecedent date. You will be sensible of the very great importance of this subject, both as to the great interest which it involves, and the manner in which a just provision for it is to be pursued. The President commits it to your hands, with expectations which it will require all your zeal, your patriotism, and your delicate management to fulfil."

SIR: DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, October 25, 1801.

In the instructions accompanying your commission, it was not forgotten that the trespasses of Spain on our commerce had laid the foundation for strong complaints and reclamations on the part of the United States; and it was accordingly made your duty to press them in a proper manner on the Spanish Government. As this violation of our neutral rights prevailed most during the misunderstanding between the United States and the French republic, and was generally masked under, or confounded with, the commission and flag of the latter, it was hoped that, with the termination of that misunderstanding, would have terminated also the abuses which Spain had permitted her subjects to connect with it. By the documents hereto annexed, consisting of a letter from the President of the Insurance Company of North America, a memorial from the chamber of commerce of Philadelphia, a letter from Thomas Fitzsimmons, Esquire, and several private letters from the captains and supercargoes of the captured vessels, you will find that, instead of fulfilling this reasonable hope, the predatory cruisers from the port of Algeziras have assumed a recent activity peculiarly alarming to our merchants. American property, to a very heavy amount, has already been a prey to the Spanish gun-boats issuing from that asylum, and it is justly apprehended, from the extent of our commerce flowing through the same channel, that a still greater portion of it will be exposed to the same fate. This apprehension is the greater, as the general disarming of our merchantmen, produced by the reconciliation with France, removes the check heretofore given to the predatory boats by the means of resisting their enterprises.

The pretext for the seizure of our vessels, seems at present to be, that Gibraltar has been proclaimed in a state of blockade, and that the vessels are bound to that port. Should the proceeding be avowed by the Spanish Government, and defended on that ground, you will be able to reply—

1st. That the proclamation was made as far back as the 15th February, 1800, and has not since been renewed: that it was immediately protested against by the American and other neutral ministers at Madrid, as not warranted by the real state of Gibraltar, and that no violations of neutral commerce having followed the proclamation, it was reasonably concluded to have been rather a menace against the enemies of Spain, than a measure to be carried into execution against her friends.

2d. That the state of Gibraltar is not and never can be admitted by the United States to be that of a real blockade. In this doctrine they are supported by the law of nations as laid down in the most approved commentators, by every treaty which has undertaken to define a blockade, particularly * those of latest date among the maritime nations of Europe, and by the sanction of Spain herself, as a party to the armed neutrality in the year 1781. The spirit of articles fifteen and sixteen of the treaty between the United States and Spain, may also be appealed to, as favoring a liberal construction of the rights of the parties in such cases. In fact, the idea of an investment, a siege or a blockade, as collected from the authorities referred to, necessarily results from the force of those terms; and though it has been sometimes grossly violated or evaded by powerful nations in pursuit of favorite objects, it has invariably kept its place in the code of public law, and cannot be shown to have been expressly renounced in a single stipulation between particular nations.

3d. That the situation of the naval force at Algeziras, in relation to Gibraltar, has not the shadow of likeness to a blockade, as truly and legally defined. This force can neither be said to invest, besiege, or blockade the garrison, nor to guard the entrance into the port. On the contrary, the gunboats infesting our commerce have their station in another harbor, separated from that of Gibraltar by a considerable bay; and are so far from beleaguering their enemy at that place and rendering the entrance into it dangerous to others, that they are, and ever since the proclamation of a blockade have been, for the most part, kept at a distance by a superior naval force, which makes it dangerous to themselves to approach the spot.

4th. That the principle on which the blockade of Gibraltar is asserted, is the more inadmissible, as it may be extended to every other place, in passing to which, vessels must sail within the view and reach of the armed boats belonging to Algeziras. If because a neutral vessel bound to Gibraltar can be annoyed and put in danger by waylaying cruisers, which neither occupy the entrance into the harbor, nor dare approach it, and by reason of that danger is liable to capture, every part of the Mediterranean coasts and islands, to which neutral vessels must pass through the same danger, may, with equal reason, be proclaimed in a state of blockade, and the neutral vessels bound thereto made equally liable to capture. Or if the armed vessels from Algeziras alone should be insufficient to create this danger in passing into the Mediterranean, other Spanish vessels co-operating from other stations, might produce the effect, and thereby, not only blockade any particular port, or the ports of any particular nation, but blockade at once a whole sea surrounded by many nations. Like blockades might be proclaimed by any particular nation ennabled by its naval superiority to distribute its ships at the mouth of the same, or any similar sea, or across channels or arms of the sea, so as to make it dangerous for the commerce of other nations to pass to its destination. These monstrous consequences condemn the principle from which they flow, and ought to unite against it every nation, Spain among the rest, which has an interest in the rights of the sea. Of this Spain herself appears to have been sensible in the year 1780, when she yielded to Russia ample satisfaction for seizures of her vessels made under the pretext of a general blockade of the Mediterranean, and followed it with her accession to the definition of a blockade contained in the armed neutrality.

5th. That the United States have the stronger ground for remonstrating against the annoyance of their vessels, on their way to Gibraltar; inasmuch as, with very few exceptions, their object is not to trade there for the accommodation of the garrison, but merely to seek advice or convoy for their own accommodation, in the ulterior objects of their voyage. In disturbing their course to Gibraltar, therefore, no real detriment results to the enemy of Spain, whilst a heavy one is committed on her friends. To this consideration, it may be added that the real object of a blockade is to subject the enemy to privations, which may co-operate with external force in compelling them to surrender; an object which cannot be alleged in a case where it is well known that Great Britain can, and does at all times, by her command of the sea, secure to the garrison of Gibraltar every supply which it wants.

6th. It is observable, that the blockade of Gibraltar is rested by the proclamation on two considerations: one, that it is necessary to prevent illicit traffic, by means of neutral vessels, between Spanish subjects and the garrison there; the other, that it is a just reprisal on Great Britain, for the proceedings of her naval armaments against Cadiz and St. Lucar. The first can surely have no weight with neutrals, but on a supposition never to be allowed, that the resort to Gibraltar, under actual circumstances, is an indulgence from Spain, not a right of their own; the other consideration, without examining the analogy between the cases referred to and that of Gibraltar, is equally without weight with the United States, against whom no right can accrue to Spain, from its complaints against Great Britain, unless it could be shown that the United States were in an unlawful collision with the latter, a charge which they well know that Spain is too just and too candid to insinuate. It cannot even be said that the United States have acquiesced in the depredations committed by Great Britain, under whatever pretext, on their lawful commerce. Had this, indeed, been the case, the acquiescence ought to be regarded as a sacrifice made by prudence to a love of peace, of which all nations furnish occasional examples; and as involving a question between the United States and Great Britain, of which no other nation could take advantage against the former. But it may be truly affirmed, that no such acquiescence has taken place. The United States have sought redress for injuries from Great Britain as well as from other nations. They have sought it by the means which appeared to themselves, the only rightful judges, to be best suited to their object; and it is equally certain that redress has, in some measure, been obtained, and that the pursuit of complete redress is by no means abandoned.

7th. Were it admitted that the circumstances of Gibraltar, in February, 1800, the date of the Spanish proclamation, amounted to a real blockade, and that the proclamation was, therefore, obligatory on neutrals; and were it also admitted that the present circumstances of that place amount to a real blockade, (neither of which can be admitted;) still the conduct of the Algeziras cruisers is altogether illegal and unwarrantable. It is illegal and unwarrantable, because the force of the proclamation must have expired whenever the blockade was actually raised, as must have been unquestionably the case, since the date of the proclamation, particularly and notoriously, when the port of Algeziras itself was lately entered and attacked by a British fleet; and because, on a renewal of the blockade, either a new proclamation ought to have been issued, or the vessels making for Gibraltar ought to have been premonished of their danger, and permitted to change their course as they might think proper. Among the abuses committed under pretext of war, none seem to have been carried to greater extravagance, or to threaten greater mischief to neutral commerce, than the attempts to substitute fictitious blockades by proclamation, for real blockades, formed according to the law of nations; and, consequently, none against which it is more necessary for neutral nations to remonstrate effectually, before the innovations acquire maturity and authority, from repetitions on one side, and silent acquiescence on the other.

In these observations, you will find a sufficient guide to the representations which it may be proper for you to make to the Spanish Government, in case justice should not have been yielded by it to the interpositions which will no doubt have been previously tried by Colonel Humphreys or yourself, or by both. Letters from the former, of the 21st and 29th of August show, that several cases of seizure had been made known to him, and that he had it in view to carry them before the Spanish Government. Considering the amicable disposition manifested, in general, by that Government towards the United States, and the mutual interest it has in maintaining perfect harmony with them, the President indulges the strongest hopes that the earliest opportunity will have been seized for repairing the wrongs which have been committed, and for preventing a repetition of them. Should this hope prove fallacious, it will be your duty to press these objects, by fair and frank representations, aided by the communications now made to you, and by an appeal to the express instructions from the President included in them; mingling always with your requisitions assurances of the cordial sentiments cherished by the United States towards Spain, and their entire confidence in her disposition to evince that justice and respect for our rights, which is not less congenial with her own high character than it is necessary for our satisfaction.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient servant.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary, &c. Madrid.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of State to Charles Pinckney, Esq. dated

"FEBRUARY 5, 1802.

"Though you have been referred to the twenty-first article of the Spanish treaty, as a model for the provision you are instructed to urge the Government of Spain to accede to, for indemnifying our commercial citizens, whose claims have originated since, it is found to be incommensurate, in some respects, with the relief expected by them. The words are, "In order to terminate all differences, on account of the losses sustained by the citizens of the United States, in consequence of their vessels and cargoes having been taken [apresado] by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, during the late war between France and Spain," &c. Thus, the twenty-first article is limited to captures, but some of our citizens have complained of injuries received from the officers of Spain, in attaching their property, for supposed breaches of its fiscal regulations; and examples are not wanting of unjust and ruinous prosecutions against our citizens upon criminal allegations. Two examples are, at least, recollected of the latter description. It might possibly be questioned, whether a seizure in port, on suspicion of enemy's property, as in the case of Captain Eldridge's brigantine Sally, would be fairly embraced within the terms of that article. Complaints have also been made of the tender laws, whereby our citizens have been paid in a depreciated medium for specie contracts. Some of these cases are marked with arbitrary circumstances, derived from the direct interposition of the Government, or its agents; others have arisen in the colonies, and, though conducted under judicial forms, have issued in the ruin of innocent individuals, who have been borne down by the weight of official influence opposed to them.

It is, perhaps, difficult to define, by a general article, which shall appear unexceptionable, the principle under which relief, in some of these cases, is expected; and, on the other hand, to attempt a detail, would hazard the attainment of what might not, under a general description, be combated. If, indeed, the latter mode should be preferred, much of the benefit to be derived from the agreement would depend upon the intelligence and character of the referees. Should a majority of them feel an undue attachment to Spanish interest, or to the artificial maxims of law, some of our claims founded in substantial justice might fail.

The following is supposed to be a form of words, which would be preferable to the twenty-first article of the treaty:

"In order to terminate all differences on account of losses sustained, since the —— day of April, 1796, (the day on which the ratifications were exchanged) by merchants and others, citizens of the United States, trading to the Spanish dominions, from the unjust seizure or detention of their persons, vessels, and effects, or otherwise, under color of authority from His Catholic Majesty, it is agreed," &c.; to which may be annexed any clearly defined exceptions, which it may appear reasonable to make at the instance of the Spanish Government.

Another expedient may be resorted to, should that Government oppose a general provision. After securing a reference to commissioners mutually chosen, of as many of the cardinal subjects of claims as may be found practicable, the remainder may be submitted to two or three of the officers of the Spanish Government, to be named in the agreement for their award; which shall not be final, unless the claimant signify his assent in a given time; and if he dissents, the claim to remain open. In this way was settled a considerable number of our smaller claims on Great Britain, for illegal captures; the Kings' advocate general and doctor of the civil law making the awards, which were generally satisfactory, and, it is believed, always accepted."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 25, 1802.

SIR:

I have received your two letters of July 1st and 6th, enclosing your draught of a convention, with the objection and alteration brought forward by the Spanish minister.

It is regretted that any difficulty should have occurred in bringing to an equitable and amicable settlement claims of our citizens, which are not likely to receive so fair a decision in any mode as through a joint Board of Commissioners. From the disposition, or rather assent, manifested at first by the Spanish Government, a more favorable, as well as more speedy, issue to your negotiation was expected; and it is still hoped that modifications may have been, or will be devised, that will make the contested article satisfactory to Spain, without being unjust to the United States.

The true object is to give to the Board a power that will reach every description of cases. According to information received, from time to time, it appears that losses have been sustained by citizens of the United States: First, on the high seas: Secondly, within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain herself: Thirdly, within the jurisdiction of her colonies: that they have proceeded, first, from Spanish subjects; secondly, from others within Spanish jurisdiction; that they have been contrary either, first, to the treaty of 1795; or, secondly, to the law of nations; or, thirdly, to substantial justice. It is desirable, therefore, that a stipulated provision, for reparing these injuries, should be so expressed as to be commensurate with this view of the cases; or, if this extent cannot be explicitly given to the provision, that it should be as little narrowed as possible.

The objection made to giving the Board cognizance of the wrongs committed by aliens, within the jurisdiction, and, consequently, within the temporary allegiance of the King of Spain, is clearly open to the reply you made to it. The authority which every sovereign has over the conduct of aliens within his territorial jurisdiction, makes him responsible to others for their conduct, as much, and for the same reason, as he is responsible for the conduct of permanent citizens or subjects. This is a doctrine too well established, both by reason and by public law, to be questioned. The United States have pursued it in practice as well as in discussion; and may, therefore, with the more energy claim the benefit of it. The remark of the Spanish minister, that the stipulation on this subject in our treaty of 1794, with Great Britain, implies that, without such a stipulation, the law of nations would not have imposed on the United States the responsibility assumed, admits of a double answer. The United States acquiesced in the doctrine before the treaty was made: and the stipulation in the treaty, like numerous stipulations in other treaties, was not meant to supersede the rule of public law, but to acknowledge and explain it.

It is not denied that there are certain exceptions to the authority over those within a temporary, which do not apply to the authority over those within a permanent allegiance; and so far, there may be exceptions to the responsibility of the sovereign also. But none of these exceptions belong to the cases in question. In the equipment of privateers, and the condemnation of prizes, in Spanish ports, the King of Spain had the same authority to restrain aliens as he had to restrain his own subjects from illegal acts towards other nations. Having this authority, his duty to other nations required him to exert it; and, failing in this duty, he made himself answerable to those injured by the failure.

This reasoning admits of no reply, unless it be that the Spanish sovereignty was under some foreign duress within its own territories: and, being not a free agent, it ceased to be a responsible one. This plea, though little consistent with the respect due from Spain to her own dignity, seems to have been resorted to. But before such a plea can be admitted at all, it ought to be shown that the force, or danger which destroyed the free agency, really existed, and that all reasonable means were employed to prevent or remedy the evil resulting to nations in amity with Spain.

The losses sustained by Americans, from aliens, and for which Spain is held answerable, have proceeded, first, from condemnations within her jurisdiction; secondly, from equipments within her jurisdiction, known to be against the American trade; thirdly, from equipments ostensibly made against the enemies of Spain, but turned against the United States; fourthly, from captures only within the limits of Spanish jurisdiction.

With respect to the first two cases, it is clear that the Spanish Government had not only the right but the power to interpose effectually, and is, consequently, bound to repair the consequences of her omission. With respect to the fourth case, the violation of her territory, might be less under her control, where the prizes were not carried into her ports; still, however, with the right accruing to her against the aggressors, accrues, at the same time, the right against her to the sufferers. With respect to the third case, there may be room for equitable considerations in favor of Spain. Perhaps these distinctions, in the several cases, may lead to an admission of the clearest and strongest of them to the same footing with similar ones, where Spanish subjects were the wrong doers; reserving to the others the benefit of the moral principle of responsibility contended for by the Spanish minister. Should the Spanish Government, however, persist in requiring, in all cases where aliens were the wrong doers, a preliminary decision by the Board, how far special circumstances absolve Spain from the usual responsibility, it becomes a question whether it may not be better to refer this preliminary decision to the Board, than to leave out of the treaty a provision for so important a class of cases, and trust to further negotiations for justice. The reflections of the President, on this subject, have led him to conclude it the better course, on the whole, that the treaty should provide for these cases, even in such a form as that proposed by the Spanish minister, than that they be left to the delays and uncertainties of further negotiation; in which it is not likely that Spain will be more flexible than she is at present, and which must, on that supposition, end, at best, in a return to arbitration on the point in controversy. You will be guided by this idea, therefore, in the arrangements which may be finally made.

The President thinks, at the same time, that whilst you admit so vague a rule as that of the morality of actions into questions where Spain claims it as an advantage, you may very reasonably urge an extension of it to other cases where it would be favorable to the United States, by obliging Spain to repair wrongs, not only against treaty and the law of nations, but against mere equity and moral obligation.

The application of this comprehensive principle of redress would be particularly favorable to claims founded on proceedings in the Spanish colonies. In a variety of cases it would give relief where neither the treaty nor the law of nations would, in strictness, prescribe it. In whatever turn the negotiation may take, it will be proper for you to keep this branch of claims in view; and to include them, if possible, within the terms of the proposed convention. I do not find that my letter of February 5, on this subject, had reached you, which I am surprised at: but you will have been reminded of the importance of these claims, by the information given you by the parties interested, as well as that furnished, from time to time, by this Department. It is probable you will soon receive an extensive application from merchants in Boston and Philadelphia, who have complaints against the colonial subjects and Governments of Spain. I have recommended to them to discriminate the cases in such a manner as to show the precise principle on which they severally turn, that it may regulate the interpretation proper for you to use with the Spanish Government. They propose to send an agent to Madrid, and to solicit the indulgence of sending attorneys or agents into the colonies to pursue their just claims there. This appears to be so reasonable, that it may be expected from the justice and fairness of the Spanish Government; and the application for it will accordingly claim your patronage, as far as that mode of redress may not be rendered unnecessary by conventional arrangements.

This letter is written on a supposition that the convention may be still depending. Should it have been closed, and without comprehending all the provisions wished for, the President relies on your further efforts to complete the work, either by a supplemental article, or by a distinct compact.

With sentiments of great respect, I am, dear sir, your most obedient.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq.,
Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid.

Extract from Mr. Pinckney's general representation to the Minister of State of His Catholic Majesty, dated

"MADRID, March 24, 1802.

"It is with much pleasure, when the undersigned arrived at this court, for the purpose of making such representations as the interest of his country required, he has found all Europe in peace. He sincerely hopes it may continue, and that its blessings will soon repair the evils of a war almost unexampled in its extent and consequences. He is aware that, during such a period, it was impossible for the best Government to prevent the commanders of private ships of war committing frequently acts contrary to the laws of nations, and not authorized by their Sovereign's orders.

"In all countries, particularly in one so extensive as that of Spain, unprincipled men will not only infringe the laws of nations, but frequently the most honorable and liberal instructions. We are sure that, as it is the true interest, so will it always be the policy, of Spain to maintain equitable and honorable opinions on the subject of neutral commerce; and that it is with much displeasure she has heard of the violations of treaties and of the laws of nations by her subjects and officers, and of the injuries they have occasioned to innocent American merchants and others.

"As peace is now happily restored, and no excuse remains for further spoliations; and, as it ought always to be the desire of Governments so friendly, and united by interests the most important, not to leave room for recollecting circumstances, which, however disagreeable, were perhaps inevitable, but to adopt all the measures most probable to impress a strong conviction of the justice and friendship of the two countries; the undersigned has the honor to request of His Majesty to consent to the proposition already made by his predecessor, Mr. Humphreys, for the naming of a commissioner, who may be authorized by His Catholic Majesty to meet another on the part of the American Government; and that both be empowered to draw lots for a third; and that the three be finally authorized to decide on all claims now depending, which have all of them been presented to your excellency, under their different descriptions, by his predecessor, and to which descriptions he requests to refer, as they are in your excellency's possession.

"The undersigned wishes to renew this proposition for the naming of commissioners, as, in all the suits of the important and delicate nature of the violations of territory by the French, which our Government contends are decided contrary to the laws of nations and our treaty with Spain, and, likewise, in those that proceed from the supposed blockade of Gibraltar, we are certain that the King cannot object to the decision of men, chosen by each Government, of the most eminent characters for knowledge and honor, or in situations of life to place them out of the reach or danger of being influenced by improper motives. With respect to the blockade of Gibraltar, he is particularly charged by his Government to represent:—

"1st. That the proclamation for the blockade of Gibraltar was made on the 15th of February, 1800, and has not been renewed since; that the American minister, and all the other neutral ministers in Madrid, immediately protested against it, as not warranted by the existing state of Gibraltar; and, as no violations ensued of neutral property, in consequence of the proclamation, it was naturally concluded to have been rather intended as a menace against the enemies of Spain, than as a measure that was to be executed against her friends.

"2d. That the State of Gibraltar never was, nor never could have been, admitted as a true blockade. In this doctrine, the United States are supported by the laws of nations, as explained by the best authors or writers; by all the treaties that have undertaken to define a blockade, and particularly by the late treaties between Russia and Sweden and Russia and Great Britain; by the most recent code of the maritime and commercial nations of Europe; and by the sanction of Spain herself, as one of the armed neutrality, in the year 1781.

"The spirit of the articles fifteen and sixteen of the treaty of Spain with the United States, is likewise fully and expressly in our favor. In short, the opinion we have formed of the blockade of Gibraltar being not a true one, necessarily results from the strength of the terms used in the definition of a blockade; and, though these have been sometimes broken or avoided by powerful nations, to obtain favorite objects, it has incessantly preserved and held its place in the code of the public law, and it cannot be shown to have been renounced in a single stipulation among particular nations.

"3d. That the situation and condition of the naval force in Algeziras, with regard to Gibraltar, had not the shadow of resemblance to a blockade as truly and legally defined. It cannot be said that this force blockaded the garrison, or guarded the entrance of the port; on the contrary, the armed boats had their stations in another port, separated from that of Gibraltar by a bay, and, being so far from doing an injury to the enemy in Gibraltar, that they generally made them keep at such a distance from that fortress, by an armed force so superior, as to render it dangerous for them to appear.

"4th. That the principle, on which the blockade of Gibraltar is supported, is less admissible, as it can be made to extend to every other port to which vessels are obliged to approach. If, because a neutral vessel in going into Gibraltar can be attacked or put in danger by privateers that are secretly waiting for them, but which, on account of their weakness, cannot occupy the entrance into the harbor, such neutrals are, notwithstanding, to be liable to be taken; every port of the Mediterranean, and the islands where vessels are obliged to go, can be said, with the same truth, to be in a state of blockade, and the vessels that go there liable to be taken; or, if the armed boats there are not sufficient of themselves to cause this danger at the going into the Mediterranean, other Spanish armed vessels of other ports co-operating, may produce the same effect, and, therefore, not only blockade some particular port, but blockade a whole sea, surrounded by many nations. These dangerous consequences ought to unite, in future, all nations against this principle, and particularly Spain, who has the highest interests in the rights of the sea. Of this Spain appears to have been sensible in the year 1781, when she gave Russia full satisfaction for the captures of her vessels made in the Mediterranean, under the pretext of a general blockade of this sea, and followed it with her consent to the definition of a blockade as contained in the armed neutrality.

"5th. That the United States have the greatest interest in remonstrating against the capture of their vessels bound to Gibraltar, because, with few exceptions, their object was not to trade with the garrison, but only to ask advice or convoy for the ulterior objects of their voyages; so that, to hinder their voyages, is not to injure the enemies of Spain, but distress her friends. To this consideration it may be added, that the true object of a blockade is the subjecting the enemy to privations that may, co-operating with external force, oblige them to surrender: an object that cannot be said to exist with respect to Gibraltar, because it is well known that Great Britain can, at all times, supply, and actually did supply, the garrison with all it wanted.

"6th. It is to be observed that the blockade of Gibraltar is founded, by the proclamation, on two considerations: one, that it is necessary to prevent as well an illegal commerce by neutral vessels as by Spanish subjects and the garrison there; the other, that it is a retaliation on Great Britain for her manner of proceeding with her naval armaments against Cadiz and St. Lucar.

"The first can never be considered as admissible by the neutrals, except under the supposition, that going into Gibraltar, under the existing circumstances, is an indulgence of Spain, and not a right of the neutrals. The other, without examining the analogy between the cases stated and that of Gibraltar, is equally without foundation or weight with the United States: against them no right can accrue to Spain for her complaints against Great Britain, unless it can be shown that the United States were in an unlawful collusion with Great Britain; a charge they well know Spain is too just and candid to make. No one can say, and they are certain that Spain will never suppose, that the United States will submit to the depredations made on their lawful commerce by any Power, or on any account whatever. The United States have demanded satisfaction from Great Britain, and other nations, and they have sought it by those honorable means which have always distinguished their love of peace and justice; and it is with great pleasure they see, in the last acts of Great Britain, of which the undersigned received official intelligence from their minister in London, that he had signed a treaty in the last month of January, by which Great Britain agrees to proceed honorably, to settle by arbitration all our demands of losses and prizes.

"The United States see likewise in the councils of France the same disposition; and are certain that their good friend the King, who has always been so distinguished for the justice and honor of his Government, will show the same disposition to the innocent merchants and mariners of the United States.

"The undersigned requests permission to add on this subject, that if it was admitted only for one moment that the circumstances of Gibraltar in February, 1800, would amount to a blockade, (and this is totally inadmissible;) yet certainly the conduct of the armed boats and vessels of Algeziras is illegal and unwarrantable, because the force of a blockade ought to have been over when the blockade was raised, which certainly was the case when the British fleet lately entered and attacked the port of Algeziras; and because, on renewing of the blockade, a new proclamation ought to have been published, and the vessels that wished to go to Gibraltar ought also to have been advised of their danger, and permitted to alter their course, as they thought fit.

"Among the abuses committed under the pretext of war, none appear to have been carried to greater extravagance, or threaten greater danger to neutral commerce, than the attempt to substitute pretended or fictitious blockades for true ones, formed according to the law of nations, and consequently none against which it is more necessary for the neutral nations to remonstrate effectually before these innovations may acquire the maturity and authority that repetitions on one side, and silent acquiescence on the other, never fail to give them.

"The great benefits that must result to active and enterprizing nations, depending entirely on their industry, agriculture, and a free commerce for unambitious public and private happiness, cannot be unknown to the enlightened mind of your excellency. It is particularly the interest of all nations to have their commerce free, and the rights of neutrality well secured: it will make them tranquil and content, and instead of viewing war as the best means of obtaining power and opulence, they will soon be convinced that the arts of peace are not only always the most legitimate, but at the same time the most certain as well as honorable.

"To no nation can the rights of neutrality be more valuable than to Spain. She is once more in peace, and the time may yet arrive when the United States being unfortunately involved in war with other nations, and Spain in peace, the latter may receive the same just and honorable attention to her neutral rights, which the United States now so earnestly solicit for her citizens."

Mr. Pinckney to the Secretary of State of the United States.

MADRID, July 1, 1802.

In my last I enclosed you all the correspondence I had then had with Mr. Cevallos, the first Secretary of State here, on the several subjects committed to me. At that time I had considered the subject of our claims for spoliations, as agreed to be submitted to arbitration by commissioners, upon those general principles which would include every description; and, so supposing, I draughted the enclosed convention, agreeing to insert two instead of one commissioner, as the Spanish Government wished it; to which draught no objection being made, (except as to the place of their sitting,) for the reasons given in my last I consented that Madrid should be inserted; had two fair copies of it made out, and prepared for signing, and transmitted them to the Secretary. To my surprise, however, instead of naming a time when I should call to sign the convention, as I had requested, I received from him the enclosed letter, marked No. 1., requesting an explanation of my meaning of the words "y otros en sus dominios," previously to the signing. Immediately upon the receipt of this letter, I furnished him with the explanation he desired, (enclosed, and marked No. 2) and requested a conference with him. He appointed the Wednesday following, at the palace in Aranjuez, at which day I attended him, and entered fully into an explanation of the nature of our claims, as well for spoliations made by the subjects of Spain, as by the subjects or citizens of other Powers who had been permitted to arm and equip their privateers in Spanish ports, and condemn and sell the vessels they had taken under the authority of French consulates exercising the powers of Courts of Admiralty; that this permission to arm and equip, and to condemn and sell had, for reasons I stated to him, rendered the Spanish Government responsible to our citizens for all the losses accruing thereby to innocent and legal traders. That precisely the same thing had occurred at the commencement of the war between England and France, in some of the American ports; that our Government, as soon as they were informed of it, had interfered and prevented it, and agreed to pay for such as had been previously taken and brought in and condemned; and that, having done so themselves, they had a right to expect it from others, particularly from a Government whose justice and honor they had always held in the highest respect. He replied, that certainly it was very honorable and generous in the American Government to do this; but he did not conceive they were bound to do it by the laws of nations, or agreeably to the dictates of justice; that His Majesty had fully considered the subject, and was ready to submit all the captures, detentions, or other acts committed by Spanish subjects to arbitration, but that he could not consent to do so, with respect to the captures by French privateers; and that he was ready to sign a convention with the exclusion of the words y otros en sus dominios.

I answered, I was extremely sorry to find His Majesty had thus determined, because our Government held a very different opinion on the subject of the captures and condemnations by the French privateers equipped in Spanish ports; and where opposite and different opinions of such importance were held by nations having equally a right to think and judge for themselves, I saw no amicable mode of determining the dispute but by arbitration; that, as my powers did not extend to the surrendering of our claims for the capture made by the French, and he said His Majesty was determined not to include them, I wished to know if His Majesty would consent to a convention for the appointment of commissioners to arbitrate the Spanish spoliations, and insert an article expressly reserving to the American Government the right to demand and negotiate hereafter, on the subject of the French spoliations. He said he would mention it to His Majesty and send me his answer: upon my return, however, to my house, I thought it advisable to make another attempt to procure the admission of such words as might enable the commissioner to arbitrate all our claims, and I wrote him the letter, a copy of which is enclosed, (No. 3,*) and thus this affair stood at the end of the conference.

From the same to the same, dated

"JULY 8, 1802.

"I have just received a visit from one of the foreign encargados de negotios here; and, from his conversation with me, I find that the Swedes and Danes, and many other nations, have numerous claims on this Government, similar to our own, for captures by the French equipped in Spanish ports, and vessels condemned therein, and that they are merely waiting to see the issue of our negotiations. This I told you before was one of the causes which increased the difficulty of our negotiation for this class of our claims, but I did not know before that the claims of other nations were to the extent I now find they are. The moment I make any arrangement with the Government here, the others will produce their claims. Mr. Cevallos knows this, and it is one of the reasons which makes the adjustment of the French spoliations a question of such magnitude, that Spain, with all her resources, would find it very difficult to meet them, for the greatest part of the claims of other nations are for violations of the Spanish territory by the French privateers equipped in Spanish ports. I sent yesterday to Mr. Cevallos the draught of another convention for his signature, and a request to him to know his ultimate determination.

"This is the third I have sent him."

Extract of a letter from Charles Pinckney, Esq., Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, to the Secretary of State, dated

"JULY 6, 1802.

"In my last I aequainted you with the state of our negotiations respecting the claims of our citizens up to that time. I have now the honor to enclose you Mr. Cevallos' letter, of the 26th ultimo, marked No. 1, in reply to mine of the same month. In consequence of this, I draughted the letter No. 2, and requested another conference with him on that subject; he appointed yesterday, and I attended him. I begun the conference by apologizing for troubling him so soon after his return to Madrid, but that, as our affairs were important and pressing, and I had the opportunity of a gentleman returning to America, I wished very much to transmit to my Government the ultimate determination of His Majesty on the subject of our claims; that, as he had agreed, so far as his own subjects were concerned, to refer them to arbitration, I wished, if in my power, to endeavor to convince his excellency that the honor and justice of Spain required that our claims for French spoliations should also be included; that, in the latter part of his letter, he had agreed to include the words "de otros," [of others] which was all we wished, but had clogged them with an explanation totally unusual and inadmissible. This was the insertion of the words, "Segun los principios que constituyen la moralidad de las acciones y su responsibilidad," [according to the principles which constitute the morality of actions and responsibility on her part;] that I had no objection to insert the words "segun los principios que constituyen su responsibilidad," [according to the principles which constitute a responsibility on her part,] but that those of "la moralidad de las acciones" [the morality of actions] would lead to discussions and explanations, which would embarrass and probably defeat the whole arbitration; that we all knew what the words the laws of nations, and the stipulations of our treaty, and the principles which made Spain responsible for the acts of others, meant; but that the morality of actions was a field so extensive, and the meaning so difficult to define, when applied to these cases, that I could wish his excellency would leave the whole business to the commissioners to determine, upon the principles of justice and equity, the laws of nations, and the stipulation of our treaty; that it would be easily in my power to convince him that, upon these stipulations and principles, Spain was liable for those captures by the French, which had been made by privateers equipped and manned in Spanish ports, and for those American vessels and cargoes which had been brought in and sold in the same. I then went into a train of reasoning, to show that, "as strangers can do nothing in a country against a sovereign's will," that, therefore, the equipping and manning these privateers, bringing in and selling the prizes, to the amount of more than one hundred sail, was not a thing to be done in a moment, or concealed from the eye or knowledge of the Government; that, being thus known, it was fair to conclude it was permitted and countenanced, and that, being so, if unlawful, Spain was bound to compensate; that the arming and equipping vessels in the ports of Spain, to cruise against the United States, with which Spain was at peace, was certainly a violation of the territorial sovereignty of Spain; and that, if she had not prevented it, when it was in her power to do so, but winked at it to the injury of the United States, she is bound to repair; that, by the law of nations, it is not permitted to a stranger, nor can any foreign Power or person levy men within the territory of an independent Government, without its consent; that he who does it may be rightfully and severely punished; that, as

* Not received.

Spain had the right to refuse the permission to arm vessels, and raise men to man them, within their ports and territories, they were bound, by the laws of nations, to exercise that right, and prohibit such armaments and enlistments, and the condemnation and sale of our vessels; and that, not having done so, she was liable to compensate and make reparation. I then stated the reasoning of Vattel and Wolf on this subject, and those excellent ones of the President, when Secretary of State, in his letters to Mr. Genet and Mr. Morris: I also informed him that I had written a letter, in answer to his of the 26th ultimo, and had therein mentioned the only explanation I thought myself authorized to enter into with respect to the French spoliations; that I would read it to his excellency, and hoped he would still consent to sign the convention in the manner it was drawn and sent to him. After reading the letter to him, he replied, he was sorry I considered the words "la moralidad de las acciones" [the morality of actions] so inadmissible; that, however certain he was that Spain was not bound by the laws of nations to make reparation in these cases, yet to show she was willing to submit the whole of her conduct to arbitration, he would consent to sign the convention with the insertion of these words; that he did not suppose, without them, the whole business would be properly before the Board; that, when thus called upon to pay, or to risk the being liable to pay large sums, by not one shilling of which the Spanish Government had ever been benefited, Spain had the right to the insertion of such clauses as would authorize the full investigation of her then situation, conduct, and motives, as it would only be upon a thorough examination of the whole, that the commissioners would be enabled to judge whether, according to justice, equity, and the faith of treaties, or, what he considered ought to be as fairly before the Board as any of them, the principles which constitute the morality of actions, or her responsibility, she ought to be really responsible for the acts of foreigners in her dominions, under the circumstances of these cases; that he had fully considered the subject, and could only sign that part of the convention with the insertion of these words. Finding him not to be brought to a change of his opinion, I told him the claims were so important, and my instructions so clear and positive, that I did not conceive myself authorized to depart from the proposition I had made, or to insert words unusual and difficult to define, and which might tend to embarrass and defeat the arbitration; that I preferred closing with him on the ground of the Spanish spoliations, inserting a clause, reserving to us a right to reclaim and demand for the French, in the same manner as if this convention had not have been made, and referring the whole business, as it now stands respecting the French spoliations, to my Government, for their decision; that, if they viewed it in the same light I did, they would probably direct some other mode to be proposed for adjusting these claims, or, at any rate, instruct me what was further to be done; that, for the present, I would draught and send him another convention, confined to the Spanish spoliations, which is now doing, and will be transmitted to him as soon as finished.

"My own opinion is, that Mr. Cevallos has heard of the Senate's striking out that article of the convention with France which respected our claims for spoliations, and that he thinks it hard Spain should be obliged to pay for violations of her territorial sovereignty, which it might not have been prudent for her, or was not, perhaps, then in her power to prevent, and for claims arising from acts committed within her dominions by the French, which, if they had been committed in their own, would have been relinquished. He never mentioned this to me, nor did I think it prudent to do so to him, because it was possible he might not be fully possessed of the facts; and, being extraneous to our discussions, I took care to avoid it."

Extract of a letter from Charles Pinckney, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Madrid, to the Secretary of State, dated

"AUGUST 15, 1802.

"Mr. Codman going to the United States, I avail myself of so safe an opportunity to write you. My last, by Mr. Gibson, will inform you of the difficulties I have met with in my endeavors to persuade the Spanish Government to consent to an arbitration which should include all our claims, as well for Spanish as French spoliations.

"Notwithstanding all my efforts, you will find that Mr. Cevallos, the first Secretary of State, and appointed as the plenipotentiary on this occasion, has continually refused the insertion of any clause worded as I felt authorized to agree to, which would include the arbitration of the prizes made under French commissions, or condemned by French consuls. For these he thinks we ought to go to the French Government; in his letter to me, while I was with the court at Aranjuez, of the 26th June, he has repeated, in writing, what he frequently told me in conversations. A copy of this I sent by Mr. Gibson, and a duplicate accompanies this; in one of my former, I detailed to you the arguments I had used with Mr. Cevallos to induce him to consent to the insertion of a clause including the French captures; but all that I could, after many efforts, bring him to consent to, was the arbitration of the excesses committed by foreign vessels within the respective territories of Spain and the United States; to this I told him I would consent, if he would add, after the words "corsarios estrangeros" the following: "o agentes, consules, o tribunales," [or agents, consuls, or tribunals.] You will find by his letter of the 7th instant he expressly refused this addition, and as the excesses committed within their respective territories by privateers would include but a few cases, and exclude the most numerous and important classes, I informed him I was not authorized to consent to any convention which might, in the remotest degree, weaken or abridge the right of the United States and their citizens to urge these claims as they should hereafter think proper; that the honor and character of our country were deeply involved in the event, it being as much their duty to feel the insults offered to the rights of their citizens, as it was to assert and defend them; that, on this question, I had made the only offer in my power; that, if he continued to decline it on the ground that Spain was not liable, under the laws of nations, or the treaty, to make reparation, that I would communicate his answer to our Government, and it would remain for them to determine what was best to be done; that, as His Majesty had said he would consent to a convention for the purpose of arbitrating all the excesses committed during the late war by the citizens, and subjects of the United States and Spain; that, knowing the friendly disposition of my Government towards Spain, and their confidence in the justice and honor of the King ultimately to arrange and adjust their claims upon honorable and equitable principles, I would consent to a convention, which should be so worded as to include the arbitration of every claim arising from the excesses of the subjects or citizens of either party, contrary to the laws of nations or the existing treaty; and which should, also, by a clause to be therein inserted, reserve to the United States and to Spain all the rights they now have to claim reparation for the excesses committed within their respective territories, by the corsairs, agents, consuls, or tribunals of foreign Powers. This convention we signed on the 11th inst. and I have delivered it to Mr. Codman of Massachusetts to give you.

"My reasons for signing it were as follows, and I trust they will meet the approbation of the President and Senate: that, upon examining the returns in the consular office here, I find the number of vessels taken or detained by Spaniards, up to the 7th October last, with their cargoes, were one hundred and one, to which are to be added twelve taken jointly by the French and Spaniards, and twelve cargoes seized or embargoed by Spain, making, in the whole, one hundred and twenty-five sail of vessels and cargoes. A few of them have been acquitted; but on all of them will arise claims for damages. To these considerable claims for captures are to be added all our other claims arising from the excesses of individuals contrary to the law of nations or the treaty, which I am informed are to an amazing amount, particularly from South America. On the latter subject, it was impossible for me to obtain exact accounts; but from every information I have received, and particularly from a gentleman who brought me a letter from you, and who has lately been in that country, I learn that the claims which our citizens have are so great as to amount to a sum of not less than five millions of dollars, and he believes probably eight millions; most of which he thinks, from a knowledge of their particular circumstances, may be arbitrated under this convention, the wording of which, I showed him in confidence, in order that I might determine how far it was sufficiently general to include every case, within his knowledge, which might be said to be contrary to the laws of nations and the existing treaty. These, added to the one hundred and twenty-five sail of vessels and their cargoes, and all the other claims arising in the Spanish, European, and West India dominions, amount, in the whole, to so considerable a sum, that finding Spain inclined to agree to the immediate arbitration of them, I did not feel myself authorized to withhold from such of our citizens as were interested the only mode of repairing their losses which at this time is practicable. I was urged to this from a conviction that it is not our wish to go to war, and that there can be little doubt of Spain hereafter agreeing to an arbitration of the French spoliations. At present, out of the whole number of vessels captured by the French, seventy-one only have been condemned, and it will require very able and minute investigation to decide how many of these have been legally or otherwise condemned; so that it is not unlikely, when the true amount is ascertained for which the citizens of the United States may have a right to compensation, the claims arising from French spoliations will be far short of our claims for compensation on account of the excesses of Spanish subjects; if this should prove to be the case. Spain, after having agreed to arbitrate the larger sum, will not hesitate to add the other rather than proceed to extremities.

"I shall continue to urge her to consent to some agreement to this effect, authorizing the commissioners to be named to arbitrate the French spoliations at the same time; and should I not be able to effect it before I can hear from you, I will thank you for your instructions, or any plan or modification you may think proper. It appears to me to be wise in us to prevent, as much as possible, the accumulation of our claims against Spain, for the more she is in arrear, or the more extensive our claims are against her, the more unwilling and unable will she be to adjust them. Take, however, from the present aggregate all our claims for Spanish spoliations and excesses, and the residue will be such as she can meet without difficulty; at least, with much less difficulty than a war with the United States."

Extract of a letter from Charles Pinckney, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in Madrid, to the Secretary of State, dated

"By Mr. Gibson and Mr. Codman, you will receive full accounts of every thing up to this time. I still entertain hopes of being able to bring this court to agree to an arbitration by the same commissioners of the French spoliations; it will be with great reluctance, but I still think it will be the case. They complain of it as one of the hardest cases that can possibly occur; that their situation was well known; just emerging from a war with France, in which they were pressed to the last extremities; obliged to suffer the French Government and consuls to do as they pleased in their ports, for fear of renewing the war, by refusing and irritating them; to be thus mortified by these violations of their territorial sovereignty by a power they could not resist, and to be obliged, after all, to pay for those prizes, not one shilling of which ever went into the pockets of the King or his subjects, appears to them to be, as they have often said, one of the hardest cases that could occur. Mr. Cevallos or the Government here do not confess this to be the motive; their pride would not suffer them to avow it; they say the laws of nations or the treaty do not oblige them; but the true reason, I believe, I have stated above. You will do me the favor to let me hear from you on it as soon as possible. In the interim, I will go on here endeavoring to arrange it as well as I can.

Upon investigating all the claims you have forwarded me, and particularly Mr. Higginson's, I find they will all come under the convention; indeed, from a review of many other cases, which were supposed to go entirely under the head of French spoliations, there can be little doubt that many of them also may be arbitrated by the commissioners; in every case where it can be proved that it was in any manner owing to the illegal interference of the Spanish Government, or officers acting under its authority, that the French were enabled to bring in or condemn the prize, or that they interfered, there can be no doubt of the authority of the commissioners to arbitrate them. If we can get the fifth commissioner, it will enable us very conscientiously and honorably to include a great number of the cases now considered as French spoliations.

7th CONGRESS.] No. 180. [2d SESSION.

DENMARK.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 24, 1803.

FEBRUARY 23, 1803.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a report of the Secretary of State, on the case of the Danish brigantine Hendrick, taken by a French privateer in 1799, retaken by an armed vessel of the United States, carried into a British island, and there adjudged to be neutral; but, under allowance of such salvage and costs as absorbed nearly the whole amount of sales of the vessel and cargo. Indemnification for these losses, occasioned by our officers, is now claimed by the sufferers, supported by the representations of their Government. I have no doubt the Legislature will give to the subject that just attention and consideration which it is useful, as well as honorable, to practise in our transactions with other nations, and particularly with one which has observed towards us the most friendly treatment and regard.

TH: JEFFERSON.

The Secretary of State has the honor to report to the President of the United States, upon the note of the minister of His Danish Majesty, dated on the 9th instant, as follows:

That it appears that the Danish brigantine Hendrick, Captain Peter Scheelt, sailing from Hamburg, loaded with an assorted cargo, and bound to Cape François, was captured, on the 3d of October, 1799, by a French privateer, and, on the 8th of the same month, she was recaptured by an American public armed vessel, called the Pickering, and carried to the British island of St. Christopher, where she arrived on the 10th.

That, from an authenticated transcript of the proceedings in the case of the said vessel, had before the court of Vice Admiralty at the said island, it appears that the said court took cognizance of the case, and awarded one-half of the gross amount of the sales of the brig and her cargo to be paid to the recaptors, and the other half, after deducting costs and expenses, to be restored to the owners. That this rate of salvage appears to have been adopted from the laws of the United States, as then applicable to recaptures of American property, and of such as belonged to belligerent Powers in amity with the United States; but it is believed that these laws had, according to decisions of our own courts, no reference to recaptures of neutral property. That, admitting, what has received the sanction of some recent authorities, that, in certain peculiar cases of danger, of a neutral being condemned by a belligerent, the recaptors are entitled to a proportionate salvage, there is much reason to believe this is not such a case, as the vessel was bound from a neutral to a French port, the whole of the property being neutral, and, according to the assurance of Mr. Lindemann, the Governor of the Danish West India islands, most of the Danish vessels carried into Guadaloupe, for a year before this capture, were released, and some of them with damages. That the courts of the United States have, in cases much more strongly marked by circumstances indicating a danger of the neutral being condemned, allowed much smaller rates of salvage.

That the laws of the United States required vessels captured under their authority to be brought within their jurisdiction; and it is conceived that it was the duty of the American officers, in this case, to repel the attempt of the foreign judicatory to take cognizance, much less ought they to have directly submitted their recapture to its decision, which, as it could not be revised or rectified, in case of error, by the tribunals of their own country, might tend to involve it in claims on its responsibility from others.

That, according to the representation of the agent for the owners of the Danish vessel, of the sum of forty-four thousand five hundred dollars, the value of the vessel, freight, and cargo, there remained, after satisfying the decree for salvage and expenses, no more than eight thousand three hundred and seventy-four dollars and forty-one cents.

That, as the policy and interest of the United States lead them, in a special manner, to respect and promote the rights and facilities of neutral commerce; as the sentence in this case was permitted, if not procured, by officers of the United States, to be made in a foreign and therefore improper tribunal; as there remains no doubt but that a court of the United States pronouncing thereon would either have rejected the claim for salvage altogether, or reduced it to the most moderate scale; as the declared basis of the sentence, viz: the law of the United States, was inapplicable to the case; and as it is understood that a remedy is now unattainable, in the ordinary judicial course, it is the opinion of the Secretary of State that, under all the circumstances, the case ought to be referred to the just provisions of Congress thereon.

All which is respectfully submitted:

JAMES MADISON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 22, 1803.

Saint Christopher:

At a court of Vice Admiralty held in and for the said island, at the Court House, in the town of Basseterre, on the 10th day of October, 1799: Present, the worshipful John Garnett, Esq. Judge Surrogate.

Peter Scheelt, master of the brig Hendrick, of Altona, in Denmark, in behalf of the owners, underwriters, and others concerned in the said brig and cargo, libellants, against the said brig Hendrick and cargo, and against Benjamin Hillier, commander, and the officers and crew of the United States' brig of war Pickering, the recaptors of the said brig and cargo.

Proclamation being made, and the court called and seated, and Mr. Mardenbrough, advocate and proctor for the said Benjamin Hillier, and the officers and crew of the said brig Pickering, who claimed the said brig Hendrick, as the captors or recaptors thereof, dispensing with the return of the motion which had duly issued after the attachment had been made, but assenting, on the part of the captors or recaptors, to the trial of the cause now coming on, the libel or allegations was thereupon opened by Mr. Tuckett, King's counsel, and advocate for the libellants; whereupon, the following evidence was produced and read, viz: the deposition of the said Peter Scheelt, the certificate of the American agent and consul to the papers on board the said brig Hendrick, and also to the laws and regulations of the American navy, produced by order of this court, and the section of the said act or regulations referred to in the said certificate, together with other documents taken from the said papers, proving the property to be neutral; and, after hearing Mr. Tuckett, fully and at large, on the part and behalf of the libellants, the substance of the claim to the brig and cargo, on the part of the captors, as their prize, was then opened by Mr. Mardenbrough, and the same, with the certificate of the agent and consul thereto annexed, being read, and Mr. Mardenbrough fully and at large heard on the part and behalf of the said captors, and Mr. Tuckett heard in reply; and it appearing to the court, by the said deposition, claim, and documents, that the said brig Hendrick and her cargo belonged to persons residing in Altona, in Denmark, and in Hamburg, neutrals, and in amity with the United States of America, and had been taken as prize by a French privateer, and had remained in possession of the French captors for the space of eight days and upwards; it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed, by his worship the Judge, who pronounced the following sentence: That the said brig Hendrick, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares, and merchandises laden and taken therein, were retaken from the enemy, after having been in possession eight days and upwards; and that, according to the regulations of the American navy, with respect to the salvage on recapture of neutral vessels, the said brig Hendrick be restored unto the said libellants, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares, and merchandises laden on board thereof, for the real and true owners thereof; and that the said recaptors, their agent or agents, be forthwith paid by the claimant, or his sureties, the one-half part of the gross appraised value of the said brig Hendrick, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares, and merchandises laden and taken therein as salvage; and that the costs and incidental expenses, to be taxed and allowed by the court, be paid out of the remaining part of such gross appraised value by the claimants and their sureties; and that, upon non-payment thereof, the said brig Hendrick, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares, and merchandises laden on board thereof, be sold under the joint inspection of the agents for the libellants and recaptors; and one full half, without deductions, be paid to the said recaptors; and the other full half, after deducting such costs and incidental expenses, to be paid to the said libellant, for the real and true owners of the said brig Hendrick and cargo, respectively. All which is hereby adjudged, ordered, and decreed accordingly.

GREAT BRITAIN.

[The following papers, relating to the subjects in negotiation with Great Britain previous to the appointment of James Monroe, as American Minister, in 1803, are inserted for the purpose of exhibiting the relations then existing with that Power. COMMERCIAL RESTRICTIONS, BLOCKADES, AND IMPRESSMENTS.

J. Marshall, Secretary of State, to Mr. King, Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, September 20, 1800.

SIR:

It is the hope and expectation of the President, that your negotiation with Lord Grenville concerning contraband of war, and the impressment of our seamen, which had progressed considerably, and been broken off, in consequence, as is here understood, of the differences between the two nations respecting the construction of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, has been or will now be renewed.

Should it have been intended to proceed pari passu with these subjects, yet our instructions respecting the claims of British creditors on the United States having, as we hope, enabled you to place that business in a train for adjustment, we are sanguine in our expectations concerning the other objects of the negotiation.

Should you be unable to obtain, what is most desired, because most just, explanatory articles, placing the original treaty on its true ground, or even to settle this difference on the terms stated in my No. 2, terms of the liberality of which I am more and more convinced, yet we perceive no reason growing out of this misunderstanding, which should obstruct the progress of an agreement on subjects the present practice on which so seriously threatens the peace of the two nations.

The seventh article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, corresponds with the sixth, and proceedings under both have been suspended. It is not my purpose to show that these two measures, viewed together, are injurious to the United States, because we do not complain, for the present, of the suspension which has taken place of the proceedings of the Board lately sitting in London. But certainly as the one measure completely balances the other, this misunderstanding can furnish to the British Government no plausible pretext for taking other steps unfriendly in themselves, or for refusing to take such as justice and friendship indispensably require.

We trust, then, that, whatever may be the fate of the propositions respectively made concerning the differences under the sixth and seventh articles of our late treaty, the negotiations relative to contraband and impressments will now progress, without interruption, to a happy conclusion.

Should this hope be disappointed, the practice of depredating on our commerce, and impressing our seamen, demands and must receive the most serious attention of the United States.

The unfeigned solicitude of this Government to preserve peace with all, and to obtain justice by friendly representations to the party committing injuries, rather than by a resort to other means, induces it now to wish that any misjudgment respecting its views and intentions, which may have been formed in the British cabinet, and which may have promoted dispositions unfavorable to that perfect harmony which it is the interest of both nations to cherish, may be completely corrected. For this the President has great and just reliance on you. If impressions of any sort have been made, impairing that conciliatory temper which enables one nation to view with candor the proceedings of another, the President hopes that your perfect knowledge of the principles which influence the Government you represent, will enable you to meet and to remove them.

That such impressions have been made by connecting two measures entirely independent of each other, is greatly suspected.

The secession of the American commissioners from the Board lately sitting at Philadelphia, and the recommencement of negotiations with France, may have been united together as parts of one system, and been considered as evidencing a temper less friendly to Great Britain than had heretofore guided our councils.

You have been assured that the suspension of further proceedings on the claims of British creditors against the United States is attributable exclusively to the wild, extensive, and unreasonable construction put by the commissioners of that nation on the article they were appointed to execute—a construction which, as we think, at once prostrated the words and spirit of the article, and overleaped all those bounds within which, by common consent, their powers were limited. You know too well the integrity of this Government, to doubt the sincerity with which this opinion is avowed; and you possess too perfectly the reasoning on which it had been formed, to feel any difficulty in supporting it. In fact, we believe that the points of difference need only be considered, to produce in every intelligent mind the conviction that the American Government is, at least, sincere in the opinion it has maintained.

Being entirely persuaded of the vast injury and injustice which would result from executing the sixth article, according to the strange system devised by a majority of the commissioners, a sense of duty and national honor, as well as a wish to preserve a solid and lasting peace between the two countries, rendered indispensable the step which has been taken. Had the United States been at open and declared war with France, without a prospect of speedy pacification, the same causes must have induced the same measure.

The suspension, then, of the commission at Philadelphia was not influenced by the probability of negotiating with France, nor have these two measures any tendency to explain each other.

It is equally true that neither of them proceeds from a temper in the United States hostile to, or even indifferent about a good understanding with the British Government.

The one has been shown to be a necessary measure of defence against what was believed to be an unauthorized attack on the interests of the United States, which, it was conceived, the British Government would not have sanctioned. The other is a necessary consequence of the well digested political system which this Government adopted early in the present war, and has uniformly sought to maintain.

The United States do not hold themselves in any degree responsible to France or to Britain for their negotiations with the one or the other of these Powers; but they are ready to make amicable and reasonable explanations with either.

In this spirit their political system may be viewed.

It has been the object of the American Government, from the commencement of the present war, to preserve between the belligerent Powers an exact neutrality. Separated far from Europe, we mean not to mingle in their quarrels. This determination was early declared, and has never been changed. In pursuance of it, we have avoided, and we shall continue to avoid, any political connexions which might engage us further than is compatible with the neutrality we profess, and we have sought, by a conduct just and friendly to all, to be permitted to maintain a position which, without offence to any, we had a right to take.

The aggressions, sometimes of one and sometimes of another belligerent Power, have forced us to contemplate and prepare for war as a probable event. We have repelled, and we will continue to repel, injuries, not doubtful in their nature, and hostilities, not to be misunderstood. But this is a situation of necessity, not of choice. It is one in which we are placed, not by our own acts, but by the acts of others, and which we change so soon as the conduct of others will permit us to change it.

The regularly accumulating injuries sustained from France had, in 1798, progressed to such a point as to leave to the United States no reasonable ground of doubt that war was to be expected, and that force, and force only, could be relied on for the maintenance of our rights as a sovereign and independent nation. Force, therefore, was resorted to; but, in the very act of resorting to it, our preference for peace was manifest, and it was apparent that we should return to our natural situation so soon as the wrongs which forced us from it should cease, and security against their repetition be offered. A reasonable hope that this state of things may be attained, has been furnished by the recent conduct and overtures of the French Government. America meets these overtures, and, in doing so, only adheres to her pacific sytsem.

To impress more forcibly on the British cabinet the principles on which this Government acts, it may not, perhaps, be improper to point their attention to our conduct during the most critical periods of the present war.

In 1793, when the combination against France was most formidable, when, if ever, it was dangerous to acknowledge her new Government, and to preserve with it the relations of amity which, in a different state of things, had been formed with the nation, the American Government openly declared its determination to adhere to that state of impartial neutrality which it has ever since sought to maintain; nor did the clouds which, for a time, lowered over the fortunes of the republic, in any degree shake this resolution.

When victory had changed sides, and France, in turn, threatened those who did not arrange themselves under her banners, America, pursuing with undeviating step the same steady course, negotiated with His Britannic Majesty a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, nor could either threats or artifices prevent its ratification.

At no period of the war has France occupied such elevated ground, as at the very point of time when America armed to resist her: triumphant and victorious every where, she had dictated a peace to her enemies on the continent, and had refused one to Britain.

In the reverse of her fortune, when defeated both in Italy and on the Rhine, in danger of losing Holland, before the victory of Massena had changed the face of the last campaign, and before Russia had receded from the coalition against her, the present negotiation was resolved on. During its pendency, the state of the war has changed, but the conduct of the United States sustains no alteration. Our terms remain the same: we still pursue peace. We still embrace it, if it can be obtained without violating our national honor or our national faith; but we will reject, without hesitation, all propositions which may compromit the one or the other.

I have thought it not entirely useless to note thus briefly the relative situation of the belligerent Powers at the several eras when important measures have been adopted by the American Government, because the review will mark unequivocally the character of that Government, and shows how steadily it pursues its system, without regarding the dangers, from the one side or the other, to which the pursuit may be exposed.

The present negotiation with France is a part of this system, and ought, therefore, to excite in Great Britain no feelings unfriendly to the United States.

Perhaps an apprehension that an erroneous estimate may have been made in the British cabinet of the views and intentions of this Government, may be unfounded. If so, it will, of course, be unnecessary to attack prejudices which do not exist. If, however, such prejudices do exist, you will, by a plain and candid representation, endeavor to remove them.

The way being thus smoothed for the reception of our complaints, the peace and interest of the nation require that they should be temperately but very seriously enforced.

These complaints are occasioned by the conduct of the British Government, through its agents, towards our commerce and seamen.

The depredations on our commerce have, of late, been so considerable, as even to give some countenance to the opinion that orders have been received to capture every American vessel bound to an enemy's port. It cannot be difficult for you to conjecture the effect of such a system.

In your correspondence with my predecessor, I perceive that these subjects have been repeatedly taken up, and that, in your several representations to the ministers of His Britannic Majesty, you have done ample justice to your country.

I am directed by the President to express to you his wish that, unless this business be in a train for satisfactory adjustment, you once more call the very serious attention of the British Government to the irritating and injurious vexations we sustain, and make one more solemn appeal to the justice, the honor, and the real interest of the nation.

Our complaints respecting the depredations on our commerce may be classed under the following heads:

1. The construction given to the article of our treaty relative to contraband of war.
2. The extent given to the rule concerning blockaded ports.
3. The unjust decisions of their courts of Vice Admiralty, and the impunity which attends captures totally vexatious and without probable cause of seizure.

We will consider:

1. The interpretation given to the eighteenth article of our treaty. Under the expression "and generally whatever may serve distinctly for the equipment of vessels," which closes the enumeration of prohibited articles, our merchant vessels have been seized and condemned, because a part of their cargoes consisted of such articles as may, by possibility, serve for the equipment of vessels, although they are not generally so applied, but are most commonly used for the purposes of husbandry; such are ticklenburgs, osnaburgs, and small nails, which, in the court of Vice Admiralty, have been adjudged contraband of war.

This vexatious construction is believed to be as unjustifiable as it is unfriendly.

As the law of nations on this subject can only establish general principles, particular treaties supply this defect by defining precisely between the parties the relative rights of each as a belligerent or neutral Power.

Thus the law of nations is clearly understood to declare that articles exclusively used in war are contraband, and that all articles not used in war are the objects of lawful commerce. But articles of promiscuous use, proper either for peace or war, may be, it has been contended, contraband or not, according to circumstances.

Admitting this opinion to be correct, it would seem to be a reasonable construction of the law, that the character of the articles thus doubtful in themselves should be determined by those circumstances which may ascertain the use to which they are to be applied. If the circumstance, and the cargo and its destination, show unequivocally that its application must be to military purposes, materials fit for both peace and war may assume the character of contraband; but if those circumstances afford solid ground for the opinion that the suspected materials are designed only for the ordinary purposes of the nation, then there can be no just motive for interrupting a commerce which ought to be pronounced lawful.

This principle would seem to mark the boundaries of the conflicting rights of neutral and belligerent Powers. For neutrals have a right to carry on their usual commerce, and belligerents have a right to prevent them from supplying the enemy with instruments of war.

But, in the application of the principle, considerable difficulty exists. The two nations judge differently on the circumstances attending each case; and, to prevent the quarrels which may grow out of this difference of judgment, a precise list of contraband is usually agreed on between them.

If, however, there be in the enumeration an ambiguous expression, it ought to be expounded with a reference to those general principles intended to have been rendered definite by the particular agreement, and the inquiry ought always to be made, whether the article was really designed for a prohibited object, or was transported for the ordinary purposes of commerce.

In the catalogue of contraband, agreed on between the United States and Great Britain, there is one description which leaves to construction what specific articles it may comprehend. It is in the following words: "and generally whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels."

In construing this expression, the British courts of Admiralty appear to consider it as including whatever might by any possibility be applied to the equipment of vessels. Although the article be in itself unfit and improper for that use, and therefore be not in common so applied, yet, if it might, by possibility, from a want of other proper materials, admit of such application, the courts adjudge, although such other materials be not wanting at the port of destination, that it is contraband of war.

This construction we deem alike unfriendly and unjust. We conceive that the expression which has been cited, comprehends only such articles as in themselves are proper for, and in their ordinary use are applied to, the equipment of vessels.

Under the British constitution, no operation is referred to the word "directly." Expunge it from the sentence, and, according to them, the sense will remain the same. But plain reason, and the soundest and most universally admitted rules of construction, forbid us to interpret by garbling a compact. The word "directly" is an important word, which forms a necessary and essential part of the description, and must have been inserted for the purpose of having its due weight in ascertaining the sense of the article. We can discover no effect which is allowed to it, unless it be admitted to limit the description to materials which, in their ordinary and common application, are in considerable quantities proper for, and "serve directly to the equipment of vessels." To exclude it, or to construe it as if it was excluded, is to substitute another agreement for that of the parties.

We do not admit the expression we are considering to be in itself doubtful. But if it was so, rules of construction, prescribed by reason, and adopted by consent, seem to us to reject the interpretation of the British courts.

As this contract is formed between a belligerent and a neutral nation, it must have been designed to secure the rights of each, and consequently to protect the commerce which neutrals may lawfully carry on, as well as to authorize the seizure of articles which they may not lawfully carry to the enemy. But, under the interpretation complained of, not only articles of doubtful use, with respect to the equipment of vessels, but such as are not proper for that purpose, if proper only in very small quantities, and which therefore are not in common so applied, are, because they may by mere possibility admit of that application, classed with articles prohibited, on the principle that they are for the purposes of war.

This construction ought to be rejected, because it would swell the list of contraband to an extent which the laws and usages of nations do not authorize: it would prohibit, as being for the equipment of vessels, articles plainly not destined for that purpose, but fitted and necessary for the ordinary occupations of men in peace; and it would consequently presuppose a surrender, on the part of the United States, of rights in themselves unquestionable, and the exercise of which is essential to themselves, and not injurious to Britain in the prosecution of the war in which she is engaged.

A construction so absurd and so odious ought to be rejected.

In addition to the injury of condemning as contraband goods which cannot properly be so denominated, seizures and confiscations have been made in cases where the condemnation, even if contraband, could not have been justified.

Articles of that description are only by the treaty declared to be just objects of confiscation, whenever they are attempted to be carried to an enemy.

We conceive it certain that vessels bound to New Orleans, and laden with cargoes proper for the ordinary use of the citizens of the United States who inhabit the Mississippi and its waters, cannot, merely on account of the port to which they are bound, be justly said to carry those cargoes to an enemy.

By our treaty with Spain, New Orleans is made for the present a place of deposit for the merchandise and effects of our citizens. Merchandise designed for the consumption of those citizens who reside on the Mississippi or its waters, and which is to be transported up that river, will, in the present State of its commerce, be almost universally shipped for New Orleans: this port being, by stipulation and of necessity, common to the subjects of Spain, and to the citizens of the United States, the destination of the cargo can be no evidence of its being designed for an enemy, and therefore liable to confiscation when composed of articles that might be used in war. In justice, other testimony to this point ought always to be received.

But the destination to New Orleans ought rather to exempt from confiscation articles of ordinary use, but which may also serve to the equipment of vessels. It is well known not to be a port usually resorted to for that object. The Spaniards do not there build or equip vessels, nor has it ever been a deposit for naval stores. When, then, a vessel bound for New Orleans, containing a cargo proper for the ordinary use of those citizens of the United States who are supplied through that port, and evidently designed for them, shall be captured, such cargo is not a just object of confiscation, although a part of it should also be deemed proper for the equipment of vessels, because it is not attempted to be carried to an enemy.

BLOCKADES. 2dly. The right to confiscate vessels bound to a blockaded port, has been unreasonably extended to cases not coming within the rule heretofore adopted.

On principle, it might well be questioned whether this rule can be applied to a place not completely invested by land as well as by sea. If we examine the reasoning on which is founded the right to intercept and confiscate supplies designed for a blockaded town, it will be difficult to resist the conviction that its extension to towns invested by sea, only, is an unjustifiable encroachment on the rights of neutrals. But it is not of this departure from principle, a departure which has received some sanction from practice, that we mean to complain. It is, that ports not effectually blockaded by a force capable of completely investing them, have yet been declared in a state of blockade, and vessels attempting to enter therein have been seized, and on that account confiscated.

This is a vexation proceeding directly from the Government, and which may be carried, if not resisted, to a very injurious extent. Our merchants have greatly complained of it, with respect to Cadiz and the ports of Holland.

If the effectiveness of the blockade be dispensed with, then every port of the belligerent Powers may at all times be declared in that state, and the commerce of neutrals be thereby subjected to universal capture. But, if this principle be strictly adhered to, the capacity to blockade will be limited by the naval force of the belligerent, and, of consequence, the mischief to neutral commerce cannot be very extensive. It is, therefore, of the last importance to neutrals that this principle be maintained unimpaired.

I observe that you have pressed this reasoning on the British minister, who replies that an occasional absence of a fleet from a blockaded port ought not to change the state of the place.

Whatever force this observation may be entitled to, where that occasional absence has been produced by accident, as a storm, which for a moment blows off a fleet and forces it from its station, which station it immediately resumes, I am persuaded, that where a part of the fleet is applied, though only for a time, to other objects, or comes into port, the very principle requiring an effective blockade, which is, that the mischief can only be co-extensive with the naval force of the belligerent, requires that, during such temporary absence, the commerce to the neutrals to the place should be free.

The next object of complaint is, 3dly—The unjust decisions of their courts of Admiralty, and the impunity which attends captures, totally vexatious, and without any probable cause.

It is not to be expected that all commanders of national ships, much less the commanders of privateers, should be men of correct conduct and habits. The temptation which a rich neutral commerce offers to unprincipled avarice, at all times powerful, becomes irresistible, unless strong and efficient restraints be imposed by the Government which employs it. It is the duty of the Government to impose such restraints. Foreign friendly nations, who do not exercise against such cruisers their means of self-protection, have a right to expect and to demand it. The failure to impose them exposes the belligerent Government to the just reproach of causing the injuries it tolerates.

The most effectual restraint is an upright judiciary, which will decide impartially between the parties, and uniformly condemn the captor in costs and damages where the seizure has been made without probable cause. If this practice be not honestly and rigidly observed, there will exist no restraint on the captors. Their greediness of gain will be checked by no fear of loss, and indiscriminate captures will consequently be made. If the vessel be adjudged a good prize, of which before an unjust judge there is, in all cases, considerable probability, the profit is theirs; if the vessel be acquitted, the loss falls entirely on the captured. The numerous depredations consequent on such a state of things is inevitable. The loss to the neutral merchant is immense. His voyage becomes not only unprofitable but injurious to him.

This is the state of things in the British possessions in America, &c.

It is only by infusing a spirit of justice and respect for law into the courts of Vice Admiralty, that their excessive and irritating vexations can be restrained.

This is the state of things in the British possessions in America. Their courts of Vice Admiralty, whatever may be the case, seldom acquit, and, when they do, costs and damages for detention are never awarded.

We know well that judges are appointed, whose duty it is to award costs and damages for detention instead of confiscation, in cases of vexatious seizure; but we know, too, the tenure by which they hold their offices, and the source from which they derive their profits, and we know their practice. We can only attribute this practice to their Government, for it has been notorious, has been of long continuance, and has never been checked. It is not to be supposed that judges circumstanced as are those of the courts of Vice Admiralty, would dare to pursue openly and invariably this vicious system, if it was known to be offensive to their Government.

The existence of an appellate court does not remove the evil. The distance of that event, the expenses and delays attendant on an appeal, the loss inseparable from a first condemnation, though it be afterwards reversed, render it a very inadequate remedy even in cases of unjust condemnation, and absolutely forbid any resort to it on a mere question of costs.

It is only by infusing a spirit of justice and respect for law into the courts of Vice Admiralty, that their excessive and irritating vexations can be restrained, and the imputations to which they subject the British Government wiped away.

This spirit can only be infused by uniformly discountenancing and punishing those who tarnish alike the seat of justice, and the honor of their country, by converting themselves from judges into the mere instruments of plunder.

Until some such reform be made, the practices complained of will continue, and must be considered by foreign nations as authorized by and proceeding from the Government which permits them.

The impressment of our seamen is an injury of very serious magnitude, which deeply affects the feelings and the honor of the nation.

This valuable class of men is composed of natives and foreigners, who engage voluntarily in our service.

No right has been asserted to impress the natives of America. Yet they are impressed, they are dragged on board British ships of war with the evidence of citizenship in their hands, and forced by violence there to serve until conclusive testimonials of their birth can be obtained. These must most generally be sought for on this side of the Atlantic. In the mean time, acknowledged violence is practised on a free citizen of the United States, by compelling him to engage and to continue in foreign service. Although the Lords of the Admiralty uniformly direct their discharge on the production of this testimony, yet many must perish unrelieved, and all are detained a considerable time in lawless and injurious confinement.

It is the duty as well as the right of a friendly nation, to require that measures be taken by the British Government to prevent the continued repetition of such violence by its agents. This can only be done by punishing and frowning on those who perpetrate it. The mere release of the injured, after a long course of service and of suffering, is no compensation for the past, and no security for the future. It is impossible not to believe that the decisive interference of the Government in this respect would prevent a practice, the continuance of which must inevitably produce discord between two nations which ought to be the friends of each other.

Those seamen who, born in a foreign country, have been adopted by this, were either the subjects of Britain or some other Power.

The right to impress those who were British subjects has been asserted; and the right to impress those of every other nation has not been disclaimed. Neither the one practice nor the other can be justified.

With the naturalization of foreigners, no other nation can interfere, further than the rights of that other are affected. The rights of Britain are certainly not affected by the naturalization of other than British subjects. Consequently, those persons, who, according to our laws, are citizens, must be so considered by Britain, and by every other Power not having a conflicting claim to the person.

The United States therefore require positively that their seamen who are not British subjects, whether born in America or elsewhere, shall be exempt from impressments.

The case of British subjects, whether naturalized or not, is more questionable; but the right even to impress them is denied. The practice of the British Government itself may certainly, in a controversy with that Government, be relied on. The privileges it claims and exercises ought to be ceded to others. To deny this, would be to deny the equality of nations, and to make it a question of power and not of right.

If the practice of the British Government may be quoted, that practice is to maintain and defend in their sea service all those of any nation who have voluntarily engaged in it, or who, according to their laws, have become British subjects.

Alien seamen, not British subjects, engaged in our merchant service, ought to be equally exempt with citizens from impressments: we have a right to engage them, and have a right to, and interest in, their persons, to the extent of the service contracted to be performed. Britain has no pretext of right to their persons or to their service. To tear them, then, from our possession, is at the same time an insult and an injury. It is an act of violence for which there exists no palliative.

We know well that the difficulty of distinguishing between native Americans and British subjects, has been used, with respect to natives, as an apology for the injuries complained of. It is not pretended that this apology can be extended to the case of foreigners; and, even with respect to natives, we doubt the existence of the difficulty alleged. We know well that, among that class of people who are seamen, we can readily distinguish between a native American and a person raised to manhood in Great Britain or Ireland; and we do not perceive any reason why the capacity of making this distinction should not be possessed in the same degree by one nation as by the other.

If, therefore, no regulation can be formed, which shall effectually secure all seamen on board American merchantmen, we have a right to expect from the justice of the British Government, from its regard for the friendship of the United States, and its own honor, that it will manifest the sincerity of its wishes to repress this offence, by punishing those who commit it.

We hope, however, that an agreement may be entered into, satisfactory and beneficial to both parties. The article which appears to have been transmitted by my predecessor, while it satisfies this country, will probably restore to the naval service of Britain a greater number of seamen than will be lost by it. Should we even be mistaken in this calculation, yet the difference cannot be put in competition with the mischief which may result from the irritation justly excited by this practice throughout the United States. The extent and the justice of the resentments it produces, may be estimated in Britain, by inquiring what impression would be made on them by similar conduct on the part of this Government.

Should we impress from the merchant service of Britain not only Americans but foreigners, and even British subjects, how long would such a course of injury, unredressed, be permitted to pass unrevenged? How long would the Government be content with unsuccessful remonstrance and unavailing memorials? I believe, sir, that only the most prompt correction of compensation for the above abuse would be admitted as satisfaction in such a case.

If the principles of this Government forbid it to retaliate by impressments, there is yet another mode which might be resorted to. We might authorize our ships of war, though not to impress, yet to recruit sailors on board British merchantmen. Such are the inducements to enter into our naval service, that we believe even this practice would very seriously affect the navigation of Britain. How, sir, would it be received by the British nation?

Is it not more advisable to desist from, and to take effectual measures to prevent an acknowledged wrong, than, by perseverance in that wrong, to excite against themselves the well founded resentments of America, and force our Government into measures which may possibly terminate in an open rupture?

As we are unacquainted with the present actual state of things in Europe, and the President has the most entire confidence in you, it is not his wish to enjoin on you a representation to the ministers of His Britannic Majesty in the terms of this letter. It is only intended to convey to you the feelings and sentiments of the Government and people of America, and to instruct you from the President himself to call the very serious attention of the British Government, in such terms of respect and earnestness as to yourself shall seem advisable, to the weighty subjects of complaint which have been stated.

With great and sincere respect and esteem, I am, sir, &c. &c.

J. MARSHALL.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, April 12, 1801.

DEAR SIR:

I lose no time in sending you the annexed copies of a letter which I lately wrote to Lord Hawkesbury, and of his answer respecting the seizure of our vessels carrying from the United States to the Spanish colonies articles of the growth and manufacture of Spain.

Although I had seen in the American newspapers repeated accounts of these depredations upon our trade, the decree of the Vice Admiralty Court of Nassau, in the case of the Leopard, Ropes, master, was the first document which I met with, that possessed sufficient precision to enable me to make it the grounds of a remonstrance.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, March 13, 1801.

MY LORD:

The decree of the Vice Admiralty Court of Nassau, a copy of which is annexed,* condemning the cargo of an American vessel going from the United States to a port in the Spanish colonies, upon the ground that the articles of innocent merchandise comprising the same, though bona fide neutral property, were of the growth of Spain, having been sanctioned, and the principle extended, by the prize courts of the other British islands, and particularly by the court of Jamaica, has been deemed sufficient authority to the commanders of the ships of war and privateers cruising in those seas, to fall upon, and capture, all American vessels bound to an enemy's colony, and having on board any article of the growth or manufacture of a nation at war with Great Britain.

These captures, which are vindicated by what is termed the belligerent's right to distress his enemy, by interrupting the supplies which his habits or convenience may require, have produced the strongest and most serious complaints among the American merchants, who have seen, with indignation, a reason assigned for the capture and confiscation of their property, which is totally disregarded in the open trade carried on between the British and Spanish colonies by British and Spanish subjects, in the very articles the supply of which, by neutral merchants, is unjustly interrupted.

The law of nations, acknowledged in the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the United States and Great Britain, allows the goods of an enemy to be lawful prize, and pronounces those of a friend to be free.

While the United States take no measures to abridge the rights of Great Britain as a belligerent, they are bound to resist with firmness every attempt to extend them, at the expense of the equally incontestable rights of nations which find their interest and duty in living in peace with the rest of the world.

So long as the ancient law of nations is observed, which protects the innocent merchandise of neutrals while it abandons to the belligerent the goods of his enemy, a plain rule exists, and may be appealed to, to decide the rights of peace and war; the belligerent has no better authority to curtail the rights of the neutral, than the neutral has to do the like in regard to the rights of the belligerent; and it is only by an adhérence to the ancient code, and the rejection of modern glosses, that fixed and precise rules can be found, defining the rights, and regulating the duties, of independent States.

This subject is of such importance, and the essential interests of the United States, whose policy is that of peace, are so deeply affected by the doctrines which during the present war have been set up in order to enlarge the rights of the belligerents at the expense of those of the neutrals, that I shall, without loss of time, submit to your lordship's consideration such further reflections respecting the same, as its great importance appears to demand.

In the mean time, as the decisions referred to cannot, from the unavoidable delay which attends the prosecution of appeals, be speedily reversed; and as the effect of those decrees will continue to be the unjust and ruinous interruption of the American commerce in the West India seas; it is my duty to require that precise instructions shall, without delay, be despatched to the proper officers in the West Indies and Nova Scotia, to correct the abuses which have arisen out of these illegal decrees, and put an end to the depredations which are wasting the lawful commerce of a peaceable and friendly nation.

With great consideration, I have the honor to be your lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

* In the case of the American brigantine Leopard, Ropes, master, laden in part with Malaga wines. The cargo, so far as it consisted of wines, though regularly imported into the United States, was condemned by Judge Kensall, 20th October, 1800; "the same being productions of the Spanish territory in Europe, and bound to the transatlantic parts of that empire."

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, April 11, 1801.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th of last month, and to inform you that, in consequence of the representation contained in it, a letter has been written, by His Majesty's command, by his grace the Duke of Portland, to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty; a copy of which letter I herewith enclose to you, for the information of the Government of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great truth, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

HAWKESBURY.

The Duke of Portland to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

WHITEHALL, March 30, 1801.

MY LORDS:

I transmit to your lordships herewith a copy of a decree of the Vice Admiralty Court of Nassau, condemning the cargo of an American vessel going from the United States to a port in the Spanish colonies; and the said decree having been referred to the consideration of the King's Advocate General, your lordships will perceive, from his report, an extract of which I enclose, that it is his opinion that the sentence of the Vice Admiralty Court is erroneous, and founded in a misapprehension or misapplication of the principles laid down in the decision of the High Court of Admiralty referred to, without attending to the limitations therein contained.

In order, therefore, to put a stop to the inconveniences arising from these erroneous sentences of the Vice Admiralty Courts, I have the honor to signify to your lordships the King's pleasure that a communication of the doctrine laid down in the said report should be immediately made by your lordships to the several judges presiding in them, setting forth what is held to be the law upon the subject by the superior tribunals, for their future guidance and direction. I am, &c.

PORTLAND.

Extract of the Advocate General's report, dated

MARCH 16, 1801.

I have the honor to report that the sentence of the Vice Admiralty Court appears to me to be erroneous, and to be founded in a misapprehension or misapplication of the principles laid down in the decision of the Court of Admiralty referred to, without attending to the limitations therein contained.

The general principle respecting the colonial trade has, in the course of the present war, been, to a certain degree, relaxed, in consideration of the present state of commerce. It is now distinctly understood, and it has been repeatedly so decided by the High Court of Admiralty and the court of appeal, that the produce of the colonies of the enemy may be imported by a neutral into his own country, and may be re-exported from thence, even to the mother country of such colony; and in like manner the produce and manufactures of the mother country may, in this circuitous mode, legally find their way to the colonies. The direct trade, however, between the mother country and its colonies has not, I apprehend, been recognised as legal, either by His Majesty's Government or by his tribunals.

What is a direct trade, or what amounts to an intermediate importation into the neutral country, may sometimes be a question of some difficulty; a general definition of either, applicable to all cases, cannot well be laid down. The question must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. Perhaps the mere touching in the neutral country to take fresh clearances, may properly be considered as a fraudulent evasion, and as, in effect, the direct trade; but the High Court of Admiralty has expressly decided (and I see no reason to expect that the court of appeal will vary the rule) that landing the goods and paying the duties in the neutral country breaks the continuity of the voyage, and is such an importation as legalizes the trade; although the goods be reshipped in the same vessel, and on account of the same neutral proprietor, and be forwarded for sale to the mother country or the colony.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, April 21, 1801.

SIR:

Although the negotiation respecting the debts is not yet concluded, and I am unable to give you any positive assurance how, or even when it will be, I have thought it proper that I should avail myself of the opportunity of Mr. Sitgreaves's return, to send you a copy of my correspondence upon this subject, as well as of that which relates to some other points that are still under consideration. I am inclined to believe that we should before now have come to a satisfactory conclusion upon the subject of the debts, had the old ministry remained in office: their successors profess sentiments respecting our concerns, with which we can find little fault; and, though they have not given me any official assurance concerning the adjustment of the several points now before them, I might, did not experience teach me that foreign circumstances have their influence in deciding the business of this as well as of other cabinets, infer, with some degree of confidence, from their language, that our affairs will ultimately be settled upon reasonable principles.

You will, I think, perceive, from the tenor of the correspondence, that I have not been insensible, on the one hand, to the great disadvantage of the delay which has already taken place, nor, on the other, to the risk to which a reasonable settlement of our affairs may be exposed by any such material changes as would be likely to alter what appears to be the present views of this Government.

Lord Hawkesbury has more than once informed me that he would attend to our concerns the first moment after he had extricated himself from the very pressing and critical state of their foreign and domestic affairs: and the under Secretary, Mr. Hammond, who is almost the only person who has any acquaintance with our affairs, has lately told me that he wished the question of the debts to be settled upon the terms I had offered, and which are mentioned in my No. 6, and, if asked, that he should so express himself to his superior.

Mr. Addington, as well while Speaker of the House of Commons, as since his late appointment, has uniformly expressed himself to me, as well as others, in a favorable manner, not only in respect to the propriety and justice of the conduct of America during the present war, but of the importance of our friendship to Great Britain, and the policy of removing whatever stood in the way of its continuance: and, in a conference upon this subject, which I lately asked of him, he told me that he would act upon those principles which he had often avowed to me in respect to America, and as soon as they could get rid of the weight of urgent business which at present bears upon them, and which he said would be in a short time, the questions respecting America should be taken up and decided.

Lord St. Vincent, too, whose opinion concerning the impressment of our seamen I had reason to believe would be of great authority either for or against the proposed article, upon that subject has explicitly told me that he thought the article a reasonable one; adding, at the same time, that the general subject, both to England and America, was full of difficulties, which were becoming more and more important as America advanced in commerce.

You must not, however, from all this, infer that our business will be settled immediately, or in a way which a wise policy requires that it should be. I think, however, that a decision cannot be much longer deferred; and I certainly do give such a degree of credit to the temper which has of late shown itself, and the language that is held respecting America, that I am disposed rather to hope for than to despair of such a settlement.

The committee of the creditors, if consulted, as they probably will be, upon the terms, will be clamorous against them. But the Government may, notwithstanding, be sufficiently wise and firm to decide this subject upon principles not only more just, as they regard its merits, than those which the committee would recommend, but with views sufficiently comprehensive to render their decisions subservient to the promotion of good will and harmony with their best, and, in all respects, their most important customers.

It will not, I hope, be thought improper that I take this opportunity to express to you how much I have been obliged to Mr. Sitgreaves for the assistance which he has given to me upon the subject of the debts, and my full persuasion, had the negotiation taken the turn which it was expected it would have done, that his information and talents would have enabled us completely to have established the justice of the explanatory article which we demanded, and which had become necessary to protect us from the injurious effects of the erroneous construction of the treaty which had been attempted at Philadelphia.

I shall keep this letter open, in order that I may send you a copy of Lord Hawkesbury's answer to my last letter, should it arrive before Mr. Sitgreaves's departure.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, March 10, 1801.

MY LORD:

I have thought it would be saving your lordship both time and trouble, in respect to the several points which have been for some time in discussion with your predecessor, if they were presented in a connected form, and accompanied by such references and observations as should in a concise manner expose the motives in favor of their adoption.

The enclosed paper, marked A, contains these points, in the shape of distinct propositions, to which the requisite form may be given, should they be adopted as additional articles to our treaty of amity and commerce.

My correspondence with Lord Grenville and Mr. Anstey, relative to the first proposition, has been so full that it does not seem necessary to add any thing further upon that head.

The second proposition was fully examined and settled in the summer of 1799; and its formal adoption was deferred until an agreement could be made respecting the subject of the first: my correspondence with Lord Grenville, and between his lordship and the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, contain what passed on that occasion. In the enclosed papers, marked B, C, and D, I have suggested the considerations which we have to offer in favor of the third, fourth, and fifth articles.

I am aware that other questions of importance continue to engage the attention of His Majesty's ministers; but our affairs having so long, and almost habitually, given way to others which have been thought more urgent, I cannot refrain from observing, what indeed the tenor of my instructions, as well as my observation of the irritation and difficulty proceeding from their unsettled state, requires me to do, that a further delay in bringing them to a decision, from whatever cause it may arise, and in spite of any representation which I could make, will unavoidably tend to impair that mutual good will and confidence which is the best security against any measure that, in its operation, might weaken the harmony and good understanding between our respective countries.

With the highest consideration and respect, &c.

RUFUS KING.

B.

NEW ORLEANS.

The inhabitants of the United States, settled upon the western side of the Appalachian mountains, exceed half a million; and, from the excellency of the climate, and the fertility of the soil, the number is daily increasing. The exchanges of their productions for the various supplies which they receive from the commercial towns of the United States upon the Atlantic ocean, are carried on through the Mississippi. No trading town having been yet established upon the eastern bank of this river, within the limits of the United States; to obviate the inconvenience arising from this circumstance, Spain consented, in her late treaty, that New Orleans should become the depository of the American merchandise and productions arriving as well from the ocean as from the interior country: and it is at this place that the Americans meet, and that the flour, tobacco, and similar productions, of those living upon the banks of the Ohio, and of other waters falling into the Mississippi, are exchanged for such other articles as they stand in need of, and which are sent from New York, Philadelphia, and other commercial cities.

Among these supplies are nails, spikes, and iron, in different forms and stages of manufacture, coarse linen, light duck, and small cordage, used for the construction of houses as well as the building and equipment of the vessels employed in transporting upon the lakes and rivers the productions and supplies of the inhabitants. The trade between New Orleans and the commercial towns of the United States has of late been frequently and injuriously interrupted, under pretence that it supplied the enemy with articles deemed contraband of war: the peculiar circumstances of New Orleans, situated in the middle of the river Mississippi, which is the boundary between the United States and Spain, and in fact an American as well as a Spanish port, have been disregarded in the courts of Vice Admiralty; and although it is notorious that it is in no sense an arsenal port, as neither ships of war nor privateers are equipped there, the law has been applied with uncommon rigor in every instance in which articles, that, by a forced construction, could be treated as contraband, have been found on board American vessels carrying the same not to the enemy, or to a place where armed ships were built or repaired, but to their fellow-citizens, who want them for necessary and innocent purposes, and who can obtain them in no other manner.

While the United States acquiesce with cheerfulness in the rights of the belligerent Powers, they are not insensible to those of peaceable nations, and are bound to pay particular attention to such as affect the welfare of their own people. So long as they continue scrupulously to fulfil the duties of neutrality, and to discourage every act of partiality, as they have done, they feel assured that they shall not call upon the justice of Great Britain in vain to accede to such regulations as, without affecting injuriously her own rights, are necessary to secure the enjoyment of those of a Power with which she lives in amity.

It is not thought necessary to give greater extension to these reflections; the object aimed to be secured is the unquestionable right of the people of the United States to an uninterrupted commercial intercourse with each other, whether the same is carried on by the ocean which washes their shores, or by the interior communications of the country: and, to avoid, in future, the interruptions of this right, it is proposed that it be stipulated, "that no American ship or vessel passing or repassing between any port of the United States, and the Island of New Orleans, situated in the river Mississippi, should be stopped or detained, upon the pretence that any part of her cargo is contraband of war."

MARCH 9, 1801.

C.

IMPRESSMENT OF SEAMEN.

In addition to the occasions of complaint, common to all the neutral Powers, against the interruptions to which their commerce is subjected by the irregular conduct of the cruising ships and privateers of the belligerents, the United States have one peculiar to themselves, arising from the practice of impressing seamen to man the British navy.

It may be confidently asserted that the United States take no measures to engage in their service the seamen of other countries: that their ships are navigated, in as great a proportion as those of any other nation, by their own people; and that peculiar pains have been taken to discriminate American from British seamen, in order to avoid, if possible, the inconveniences and misunderstanding of the interfering claims of the two countries.

The subject having been very fully explained in a letter to Lord Grenville of the 7th of October, 1799, requires no further development on the present occasion. It is hoped that measures will be devised, upon the return of peace, which, by securing to both parties, as far as practicable, the services of their respective seamen, shall moreover protect them from the inconveniences and injury to which each may be exposed by the continuance and extension of the practice of impressing seamen out of the vessels of the other. A limited and temporary regulation is necessary for the safety of the American navigation, which of late, and especially in the American seas, has been exposed to the greatest risks, by the loss of seamen taken out of American ships by the ships of war of Great Britain.

Admitting that each, within its territorial limits and jurisdiction, may detain its own seamen found in the service of the other, in order that they may be employed in its own, it by no means follows that this can be done upon the open seas, where the jurisdiction of all nations is equal.

The belligerent right to examine, in time of war, neutral ships sailing upon the ocean, gives no countenance to the practice of stopping them for the purpose of searching for and seizing such of their crews as may be claimed as subjects of the belligerent nation.

If this practice be justifiable, it is as much so in peace as in war; and, as it may be resorted to by one nation as well as another, the consequence of its becoming general would be the universal interruption, in peace as well as war, of the beneficial intercourse and commerce of nations. The advantages to Great Britain derived from this practice are inconsiderable, could they be justified; while the injury to the United States is not only destructive of the security of friendly property, but sometimes a violation of the laws of humanity. Instances have recently occurred in which every able seaman has been taken out of an American ship met by a British cruiser in the American seas, and replaced by boys and invalids, leaving not only the ship and cargo, but the lives of the people, exposed to the perils of the ocean.

To restrain this abuse in future, and until more comprehensive and precise regulations can be devised to secure the respective rights of the two countries, it is proposed that it be agreed "that neither party shall upon the high seas impress or take any seaman, or other persons, out of the vessels of the other."

D.

MARYLAND BANK STOCK.

Several years before the American war, the colony of Maryland, by a tax collected from its inhabitants, raised a sum of money, which was remitted to three London merchants of the name of Hanbury, Grove, and Russell, to be invested in bank stock. The object of the investment was the creation of an annuity applicable to certain public purposes in the colony. This stock, the dividends having been invested in new capital, must amount at this time to about one hundred thousand pounds.

In the course of the American war, the real estates of British subjects were confiscated by the State of Maryland, and property belonging to both Hanbury and Russell was included in the confiscation. On the return of peace, Maryland called upon the trustees, Hanbury, Grove, and Russell, to account. Grove lost nothing in Maryland, and did not object to account. Hanbury consented to account, in consequence of an agreement made with the agent of Maryland, by which his loss is to be compensated as soon as the stock is transferred to the State. Russell refused to account, and set up a claim to indemnify himself out of the stock for his property confiscated in Maryland, taking care, notwithstanding, to prefer his claim, with those of the American loyalists, for compensation from the British Government. At this stage of the business, the agent of Maryland filed a bill in Chancery against the trustees, to oblige them to account. Grove was indifferent which side prevailed; Hanbury united with the agent of Maryland, as his compensation depended upon the transfer being made to the State; Russell still opposed, and preferred his claim for compensation out of the stock which was ordered to be transferred to the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, in whose name it now stands. The suit has been upwards of fifteen years depending. After hearing one or two arguments, the Chancellor informally gave an opinion that the stock had belonged to the colony of Maryland, a corporation created by the Crown; that this corporation had been dissolved, and that the property in question had accrued to the King; that the suit before him was brought by an independent State, over which he had no jurisdiction, and, for this reason, that he must dismiss the bill; suggesting, at the same time, that he would suspend doing so, as perhaps His Majesty might signify his pleasure that the stock should be transferred to the State of Maryland. As soon as this opinion was pronounced, Russell communicated it to the commissioners charged with the claims of the American loyalists, who thereupon granted their certificate of the amount of Russell's loss, which was immediately presented and paid at the Treasury. This payment put an end to the only impediment, on the part of the trustees, to the transfer of the stock.

Lord Baltimore and some others, having no connexion with this trust, but alleging that their property had been confiscated in America, preferred claims for indemnity out of this fund. If their losses arose from the confiscation of real estates, which the United States were not bound to restore, Great Britain not only consented to compensate them, but in fact has done so, and in the most liberal manner: if they proceeded from the confiscation of debts, the treaty of peace, as well as that of amity and commerce, provides for their recovery, notwithstanding such confiscation; and, in either case, the claimants have no demand upon the stock in question.

The Legislature of Maryland, not feeling the force of the fiction by which the property in question is supposed to have accrued to the Crown, in consequence of the dissolution of the colonial corporation, (a dissolution to which the King gave his consent in the treaty of peace which is understood to have secured to the State all the property belonging to the colony,) is annually engaged in an inquiry respecting this property, the delays and impediments in the recovery of which excite and disseminate dissatisfaction, and every year do more and more injury to that harmony and good will which it is so much to be desired may long subsist between the two countries.

It is understood that the King has always been willing to relinquish all claim to this property; and the Lord Chancellor, from time to time, has given assurances that measures should be devised to effect its transfer. To bring this business to a close, it is proposed to add an article to the treaty of amity, &c., by which it shall be stipulated "that His Majesty consents to release all claims that he may have to the stock in question, and that immediate measures shall be taken to transfer the same to the American minister, for the use of the State of Maryland."

APPENDIX.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING CONTRABAND OF WAR.

Mr. King to Lord Grenville.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, March 25, 1799.

MY LORD:

With a view to greater precision, it might be advantageous to recast the whole of the eighteenth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation; but this would require more time and attention than could, perhaps, at this moment be spared from other and more urgent engagements, or than would consist with the speedy attainment of the particular object of the conference that I lately had with your lordship on this subject.

Referring, therefore, to some future period the general subject, I submit to your lordship's consideration the proposal that I am ordered to make in respect to a more exact definition of the articles of naval stores, which, according to the intention of the parties, and the law of nations, ought to be esteemed as contraband of war.

Our treaty, after enumerating certain articles, as arms and implements, serving for the purpose of war, adds, "and also timber for ship building, tar, or rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and generally whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir plank only excepted."

It is in consequence of the great comprehension of the last clause of this paragraph, that the ships of the United States trading to the Dutch and Spanish colonies are subjected to great loss and damage, by seizure and detention, for having on board either iron nails of various sizes, which serve directly and chiefly for the construction of houses and other buildings in the said colonies, and for the making of sugar casks, boxes, and other packages, or osnaburgs, an inferior sort of thin, coarse linen, and used chiefly for negro clothing. Nails of this description are of a size that cannot supply the place of spikes which serve directly for ship building; and osnaburgs are wholly unfit for the sails of vessels even of the lowest tonnage that frequent the ocean. Notwithstanding this difference between sail-cloth and osnaburgs, and between spikes and house nails, as well as between their respective uses, the one is confounded with the other by the British cruisers in the West Indian seas.

In order to avoid the interruption and loss arising from this error, we propose, by way of an additional article, to agree upon the enumeration of those articles which alone shall be deemed to serve directly for the equipment of vessels, or upon an enumeration of such as shall not be so considered; or, if it shall be preferred, to exchange declarations, to be followed by correspondent instructions to your ships of war, cruisers, and Courts of Admiralty, excepting the articles above mentioned from the catalogue of articles deemed to be contraband of war.

In any of these modes, the object at which we aim may be attained: the choice is submitted to your lordship, in the persuasion that the end is one that must receive your lordship's approbation.

With perfect consideration, &c.

R. K.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, April 22, 1799.

Lord Grenville presents his compliments to Mr. King, and has the honor to send him enclosed a specification of the nails which it is understood may be excepted, without inconvenience, from the provisions of the eighteenth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Majesty and the United States.

Specification.

Nails, clasp headed,	Of sizes for house building.
Ditto, fine,
Spikes,
Brads, batten,
Ditto, flooring,
Nails, flat headed,	Of sizes for sugar casks and boxes.
Ditto, trunk,

Mr. King to Lord Grenville.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, April 30, 1799.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Lord Grenville, and has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of his lordship's note of the 22d instant, enclosing a specification of such nails as are understood not to be included in the catalogue of articles deemed contraband of war. Mr. King is not certain that the proposed specification includes the different sorts of nails used for house building in Great Britain, as the rose-headed nail, and perhaps others, are omitted; and he is the more apprehensive that any description by mere names will be insufficient, as different names are given to nails of the same sizes in the United States and in England; the American names being generally taken from the uses to which the nail is applied, or from the price per hundred or per thousand. Other names, differing from those of England and the United States, may be given to the same nails in the British colonies, and the article intended to be explanatory may itself require explanation.

To avoid this want of precision, Mr. King takes the liberty to suggest, instead of the enumeration, or a specification, as has been proposed, that it should be agreed that all iron nails under the size of spikes or deck-nails should be excepted from, and not included within, the provisions of the eighteenth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and Great Britain.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, May 27, 1799.

Lord Grenville presents his compliments to Mr. King, and has the honor to transmit to him the copy of a letter from Mr. Nepean to Mr. Hammond, conveying the opinion of the commissioners of His Majesty's navy, as to the description of nails which they conceive may be excepted from the provisions of the eighteenth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Majesty and the United States.

Evan Nepean to George Hammond.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, May 24, 1799.

SIR:

My Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty having referred to the Navy Board your letter to me, of the 6th instant, respecting such sort of nails as are understood not to be considered as amongst the articles deemed contraband of war, and they having reported it to be their opinion that nails under four inches in length, without any other description, may be excepted from the provisions of the eighteenth article of the treaty of amity, I have their lordships' commands to acquaint you therewith, for the information of Lord Grenville; and am, &c.

E. N.

Mr. King to Lord Grenville.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, June 5, 1799.

MY LORD:

I have had the honor to receive your lordship's note, of the 27th ultimo, enclosing a copy of Mr. Nepean's letter to Mr. Hammond, respecting the description of nails not included in the provisions of the eighteenth article of our treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation. The description appears to me to be satisfactory; and nothing now remains to attain the object of my note of the 25th of March, but to agree in a like satisfactory description of such cloth as, upon the allegation of its being sail-cloth, is erroneously supposed to be contraband of war, and so included within the provisions of the above mentioned article.

On this head, I take the liberty to propose to your lordship that it shall be agreed "that osnaburgs, ticklenburgs, Russia sheeting, and all other cloth made of hemp or flax, and not generally and chiefly made use of for the sails of ships, shall be excepted from the provisions of the aforesaid article of our treaty."

It seems hardly necessary to remark that the comprehensive provisions of the treaty in question, in respect to articles deemed contraband of war, secure all the material or important rights and interests of the belligerent; and that it cannot be desirable to enlarge the construction of these provisions, so as to embarrass the neutral in a trade little or not at all capable of being any way prejudicial to the belligerent. With the most perfect reliance upon your lordship's liberality and moderation on this as on other and more important occasions,

I have the honor, &c.

R. K.

Same to same.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, August 1, 1799.

MY LORD:

The number of complaints that I continue to receive of the interruption of the American trade in the West Indian seas by His Majesty's cruisers, occasioned by a mistaken interpretation of our treaty in respect to the articles of contraband, will be my apology for recalling your lordship's attention to my former representations upon this subject.

As I understand the import of our past correspondence, the explanations concerning nails and sail-cloth are settled, and nothing remains but to agree that "iron in square or flat bars" is not contraband of war—a proposition so plain and reasonable that I flatter myself no difference of opinion respecting it can exist between us. A short article to this effect, and including the other two points, would at once put an end to the greatest portion of the complaints that have so frequently occurred in the course of the last ten months.

With very great respect, &c.

R. K.

Mr. King to Mr. Hammond.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, September 14, 1799.

Mr. King presents his compliments to Mr. Hammond, and, according to his request, takes the liberty to send him enclosed the draught of the proposed additional article to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and Great Britain, which Mr. King is more and more anxious, on account of the continued interruptions of the American trade, should be concluded with the least possible delay.

Explanatory article to be added to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America.

Whereas, by the twenty-eighth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, signed at London, on the 19th day of November, 1794, it was agreed that the contracting parties, from time to time, would readily treat of and concerning such further articles as might be proposed; and that such articles, after having been duly ratified, should be added to, and make a part of, that treaty: And whereas doubts have existed whether, according to the just interpretation of the eighteenth article of the said treaty, the goods and merchandise hereinafter mentioned might not be considered as included within its provisions, and treated as contraband of war: And as it is expedient that the doubts aforesaid should without delay be removed, the undersigned, being respectively named by His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America their plenipotentiaries for the purpose of treating of and concluding such articles as may be proper to be added to the said treaty, in pursuance of the above mentioned stipulation, and having communicated to each other their respective full powers, have agreed and concluded, and do hereby declare, that iron in flat or square bars, iron nails of less than four inches in length, osnaburgs, ticklenburgs, Russia sheeting, and all other cloth made of hemp or flax, and not generally and chiefly used for the sails of ships, are excepted from, and not included within, the provisions of the said eighteenth article, and that none of the said goods and merchandise shall be considered or treated as contraband of war.

This explanatory article, when the same shall have been ratified by His Britannic Majesty, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be added to, and make a part of, the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, signed at London, on the 19th day of November, 1794, and shall be permanently binding upon His Majesty and the United States, and upon their respective subjects and citizens.

In witness whereof, we, the said undersigned, plenipotentiaries of His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, have signed this present article, and have caused to be affixed thereto the seal of our arms. Done at London, this —— day of ——, 1799.

Mr. King to Lord Grenville.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, November 18, 1799.

MY LORD:

I have heretofore represented to your lordship the frequent interruption received by our navigation in the American seas, under the pretext that bar-iron, nails, Russia sheeting, and some other articles of innocent merchandise, might be considered and treated as contraband of war. The conferences that I have had with your lordship upon this subject gave me reason to expect that these embarrassments, so detrimental to us and so little beneficial to others, would in future be checked by an explanatory article to our treaty that should distinctly exclude these articles from the catalogue of contraband.

But these interruptions, instead of ceasing, as we hoped would have been the case, have of late been increased and extended: for not only the private armed ships in those seas, but the squadron under Sir H. Parker, have together fallen upon our navigation, and a large portion of our ships engaged in the trade between the United States and the Spanish colonies have been seized, and their cargoes condemned, as we are informed, upon the extraordinary and erroneous pretence that Spain had interdicted the trade of foreigners with her colonies; and this at the same time that numerous adventures to the Spanish colonies, composed, in some instances, of the very cargoes taken from the Americans, were undertaken by and on account of British subjects residing in the islands to which the American ships were sent for adjudication.

We are ignorant whether orders have been given that can, in any degree, countenance these ruinous depredations, or whether they proceed from less excusable motives on the part of the captors. It is our inclination to believe that no such orders have been given; but the effect is nearly the same on either hypothesis, as the great loss by the disadvantageous sale of our cargoes, under the decrees of the provincial courts of admiralty, joined to the time and expense requisite to bring to an issue our claims before the court of appeals, produce a result that, in a plurality of cases, makes it a measure of prudence to abandon our property, instead of pursuing the remedy that is held forth to us.

It is my duty to complain to your lordship of the injury that, under color of His Majesty's authority, is thus committed upon the citizens of a country that has given, and continues to give, unequivocal proofs of a sincere desire to live in friendship with Great Britain; and, in doing so, I am anxious to press upon your lordship's consideration the uneasiness and dissatisfaction so unfavorable to the intercourse and harmony between our respective countries, that must, and especially at the present moment of commercial embarrassment, proceed from losses so unexpected and considerable.

Your lordship will, I persuade myself, order this complaint to be investigated without delay: and so unjustifiable has been the conduct of the captors, that I flatter myself that not only a prompt and adequate remedy will be afforded to the sufferers, but, moreover, that such precise instructions will be given as shall secure us against the like injuries hereafter.

With the most perfect consideration, &c.

R. K.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, June 1, 1801.

DEAR SIR:

Annexed I send you the copy of a letter which I have just received from Lord Hawkesbury, on the subject of the depredations upon our trade in the West Indies. As there can be no objection to its publication, you will perhaps think it advisable to have the letter and its enclosures printed in our newspapers, by which means it will reach the West Indies, and be seen by those whose abuses it seems intended to restrain.

Two days ago, by Lord Hawkesbury's request, I waited upon him in Downing street, when he informed me, that, having understood that we were about to send a small squadron of frigates into the Mediterranean for the protection of our trade against the Barbary Powers, he had received the King's commands to state to me, for the information of the President, that His Majesty had given orders that the ports of Gibraltar, Minorca, and Malta should be open to our ships of war, and that they should, moreover, be supplied from His Majesty's magazines in those ports with whatever their necessities might, from time to time, require. I, of course, made my acknowledgments for this friendly communication, and added, that I would immediately transmit it to you, for the President's information.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, May 30, 1801.

SIR:

I have the honor to transmit to you, for your information, the copy of a letter (with its enclosures) from Mr. King to Mr. Hammond, in answer to a representation which I had directed to be made to the Duke of Portland, on the subject of the capture of American vessels trading to the Spanish colonies in the West Indies; and I trust that you will consider this communication as furnishing an additional proof of the disposition of His Majesty's Government to repress any practices on the part of His Majesty's subjects which may tend to molest or impede the legal commerce of the citizens of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

HAWKESBURY.

Mr. John King to Mr. Hammond.

WHITEHALL, May 27, 1801.

SIR:

Having laid before the Duke of Portland your letter of the 18th instant, with its enclosures, relative to the capture of American vessels trading to the Spanish colonies in the West Indies, His Grace lost no time in referring them to the consideration of His Majesty's Advocate General; and I am now directed to transmit to you, for Lord Hawkesbury's information, a copy of his report thereupon, together with a copy of a letter which the Duke has written upon the subject to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

I am, &c. J. KING.

Letter from the Duke of Portland to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

WHITEHALL, May 27, 1801.

MY LORDS:

I transmit to your lordships, herewith, for your information, an extract of a letter from Mr. Thornton, His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in America, to Lord Grenville, with copies of its enclosures, relative to the capture of American vessels trading to the Spanish ports, together with a copy of the report of His Majesty's Advocate General, to whom, by the King's command, the papers in question have been referred.

I have, at the same time, the honor to signify to your lordships His Majesty's pleasure that you should direct the Judges of our Colonial Vice Admiralty Courts to follow and be guided in their decisions in cases relating to the trade carried on between a neutral and belligerent nation, by the rules and principles established in the High Court of Admiralty, and laid down in the enclosed report of His Majesty's Advocate General. And the better to enforce a uniform and strict adherence to those principles, I am further to signify to you the King's commands that directions should be given to withdraw letters of marque and reprisal in cases where the owners thereof shall appear wilfully and knowingly to have captured and brought in for adjudication, contrary to His Majesty's existing instructions, vessels trading between a neutral country and the enemy's colonies.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PORTLAND.

Report of the King's Advocate.

LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS, May 23, 1801.

MY LORD DUKE:

I am honored with your Grace's letter of the 19th instant, transmitting to me several papers which have been communicated to your Grace by Lord Hawkesbury, from His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in America, with a direction to take them into consideration, and to report to your Grace, for His Majesty's information, my opinion, whether, in consequence of what is contained in the extract of Mr. Thornton's letter to Lord Grenville, especially that part of it which states "a principle to have been lately adopted in the Courts of Vice Admiralty at Jamaica and Providence, that no commerce would be permitted between a belligerent and neutral nation, in the vessels of the latter, but such as had been authorized previously to the commencement of hostilities," it would be advisable to make any or what communications to the Vice Admiralty Courts at Jamaica and the Bahamas for their guidance and direction.

In obedience to your Grace's commands, I have considered the papers referred to me, and I have the honor to report that the principle stated to have been lately adopted in the Courts of Vice Admiralty at Jamaica and Providence, is directly in opposition to the decisions daily passing in the High Court of Admiralty and the Court of Appeal. It has been held by the tribunals of this country that neutrals cannot be admitted by the enemy, under the pressure of war, to carry on his colonial trade, from which, in time of peace, they were wholly excluded. But this principle may be, and has been, on account of special circumstances during the present hostilities, to a certain degree relaxed. His Majesty's instructions of January, 1798, only order that vessels shall be brought in for legal adjudication, which are coming directly from the enemy's colonies to Europe, and not being bound to England or a port of their own country. A trade between the neutral country and the enemy's colonies is now clearly permitted. Colonial produce actually imported into the neutral country may also be re-exported from thence to any other place, even to the mother country of that colony of which it is the produce. His Majesty's existing instructions are, therefore, the rule, by which at present the Judges of the Vice Admiralty courts ought to govern themselves; and I humbly apprehend that it would be advisable to convey to the courts referred to a direction to that effect, as the application of the more extended principle upon which they are represented to act may be productive, not only of much injustice, but of great public inconvenience.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. NICHOLL.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Rufus King, Minister to England, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 10, 1801.

The accounts of peace have, with some interested exceptions, given the most sincere pleasure throughout the United States. Its effects have not yet very fully unfolded themselves, but are appearing in the fall in prices of some of our productions, particularly flour and grain. It is thought probable, however, that, as often happens, the first effect will in this case exceed the more durable one. It is certain that the quantity of these particular articles, promised to foreign markets by the exuberance of our summer harvests, will be materially abridged by the scanty crops of Indian corn which, in the Middle and Southern States, have failed more generally than has for many years happened.

Among the effects of the peace in this country, none will be more important than the shock which will be felt by our navigation. Besides the loss of the extra carrying trade derived from the war, the countervailing act of Great Britain, founded on the treaty of 1794, must inevitably banish American vessels from all share in the direct trade with any part of the British dominions, as fast as British vessels can enter into competition. I have already heard of one instance in which an American owner of eight or ten ships has chartered a British ship for a cargo of cotton, as preferable to the use of his own. Instances, I am told, have occurred, even during the war, in which merchants, inattentive to the British statute, or ignorant of it, have found, to their regret, that, by shipping tobacco in American bottoms, when British bottoms could have been had, they were considerable losers by it.

This subject can scarcely fail to produce much sensation in some classes of our citizens. Three remedies occur for consideration. The first is that of imposing light duties on foreign vessels. This may fairly be done; but, if carried to an amount materially relieving our navigation, would probably be construed into an indirect violation of the compact. The second remedy might be to repeal here the discrimination between American and foreign ships, with respect to the impost on their cargoes, and to call on Great Britain to repeal her countervailing law. An objection to this expedient is, that it would either give an unnecessary advantage to other foreign nations, or involve disputes or complaints from them. Another difficulty is, that before these concurrent repeals could be brought about, a great part of the evil will have taken place. The third remedy is that of an immediate amendment of the British act adjusting the countervailing duties to a real equality with those of the United States. This, it is conceived, may be justly claimed on the ground that the known object, the true spirit, and the obvious import of the terms of the treaty, require that the relative advantages and disadvantages of the vessels of the two countries, in the trade between them, should become such as to put them on a fair equality. Before the treaty took place, it was complained by Great Britain that her vessels were placed under an inequality and disadvantage by the difference of tonnage duty, and a difference of one-tenth in the impost on merchandise laid by the United States in favor of their own vessels. In the treaty, the United States agreed that Great Britain might countervail these differences—in other words, might lay an equal tonnage duty on American vessels, and a duty on their cargoes equivalent to the additional duty laid in the United States on the cargoes of British vessels. By calculating this additional duty of ten per cent., not according to its real or estimated amount in the United States, but according to British rates, which are more than ten times as high, and in many articles near ten times ten, every idea of equalization is abandoned, and the alleged difference in favor of one side, which was to be remedied by the treaty, is, by the construction of the treaty, made infinitely greater in favor of the other side. No sound rules of interpretation can authorize such a consequence, nor, I will add, can any wise policy adhere to it.

What course may be preferred by Congress, on this occasion, is not known. It is not improbable that one or other of the expedients within their powers may be taken into consideration. The expedient, which belongs to the Executive Department, may, in the mean time, be a subject of negotiation, and being the most eligible, will, if likely to succeed, preclude a resort to any other. It is accordingly the wish of the President that no time may be lost in stating to the British Government the light in which their countervailing act is viewed here, and in endeavoring to obtain an accommodation of it to some rule that will produce a real equality to the navigation of the two countries, as intended by the parties, instead of that ruinous inequality to the navigation of one of them, which must result from the rule adopted.

This subject would have been committed to your attention at an earlier day; but it was thought best to await the conclusion of others depending with the British Government. The sudden and unexpected peace which has taken place varies the case, and calls for an immediate interposition in behalf of our citizens.

France, also, has a discrimination in force, which must exclude American vessels from any share in the carriage of the important article of tobacco to her ports. But as no stipulation can be pretended to restrain us from countervailing the inequality, the remedy is in our own hands if she should not see the propriety of applying it herself.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, February 5, 1802.

SIR:

Having carefully examined what would be the footing of our navigation with the British dominions, upon the return of peace, I was quite prepared for, and, indeed, by several conversations, with Mr. Addington and other members of the administration, had already brought under consideration the subject of your letter of the 10th December, which I received a few days ago.

Immediately after its receipt, I intimated to Lord Hawkesbury my desire to confer with him respecting the points to which it relates; and, upon his naming a day for this purpose, I prepared and sent him the paper, a copy of which is annexed. Yesterday, I received the duplicate of your letter, of December 22d, which has enabled me to be more explicit, than I otherwise should have been, in my conference of this morning with Lord Hawkesbury. I began it by observing that, during the continuance of the war, which had the effect to procure to our vessels some preference over theirs, we had not called their attention to the inequality of their laws, in respect to the commercial intercourse between the two countries; but as the war was now at an end, we could not delay calling upon them to reverse these commercial regulations, in order that they may be made conformable to the respective rights of the two countries. The revision of certain branches of these regulations being more urgent than that of others, and the countervailing duties upon articles imported into Great Britain, in American vessels, appearing to be the most urgent, I confined my observations chiefly to this point, explaining to Lord Hawkesbury my motives for doing so; and, after suggesting some further reflections, in addition to those contained in the paper I sent to him, I proposed that they should agree, either

To discontinue the countervailing duties on articles imported from the United States, in American vessels, as soon as the difference of duties on articles imported into the United States in American and British vessels, shall be abolished: or

To repeal the countervailing duties on imports, and impose duties upon all articles exported from Great Britain to the United States in American vessels, corresponding with the difference of duties payable upon the importation of the like articles into the United States in American and British vessels.

Lord Hawkesbury admitted that the only legitimate purpose of the countervailing right, reserved to Great Britain, was to equalize the advantages and disadvantages of the vessels of the two countries in their commercial intercourse. He said not a single word in vindication of the manner in which this right had been exercised; and, after intimating a preference of the first of the two propositions which I had made, he said he would submit the subject immediately to the cabinet, and apprise me of its decision with as little delay as possible.

The American mail was to have been despatched to-morrow; but, upon my expressing to Lord Hawkesbury my hope that a few days only would be requisite to enable him to give me an answer upon the subject of our conference, and my solicitude to transmit it to you by the packet, he said he would order the packet to be detained.

The few words which I said concerning the tonnage duty, was, in every respect, conformable to the observations upon that subject in the paper sent to Lord Hawkesbury; and the more I consider it, the more am I satisfied that we shall find the advantage of establishing light-house duties so as to be distinct from the public revenue.

Lord Hawkesbury assured me that the subject of the West India trade should be immediately put in a train for examination.

I have but one observation to add: it is, that the return of peace will not establish cordial harmony and good humor between this country and the maritime nations of Europe, among which a general opinion prevails, whether correctly, is another point, that the commercial and financial prosperity of England is, in too great a degree, at the expense of her neighbors.

These sentiments may lead to restrictions and embarrassments upon the European commerce of this country, which will not fail to make its trade with us an object of still greater value and importance than it is already known and confessed to be. Difficulties of this sort are anticipated, and the Government consoles itself with the expectation of a progressive increase of the sale of its manufactures in America.

The inference from these remarks is, that the present time is a favorable one to press for the consideration and admission of our just claims to a fair and equal share of the advantages to be derived from the navigation and trade between the two countries. The regulations upon this subject should, in the first instance, be temporary and ex-parte; in this way they may be adjusted to the reciprocal rights of the parties, and then become matter of national stipulation.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, February 3, 1802.

MY LORD:

With the view of assisting our conference on Friday next, I have prepared, and take the liberty to send your lordship the enclosed paper, concerning the present footing of the navigation and trade of the United States with the dominions of Great Britain; and which likewise suggests the grounds of our claim to an equal participation in the navigation employed between the United States and the British West Indies, as well as the objections which we have against the act of Parliament for carrying into execution the treaty of 1794.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, your lordship's most obedient and very humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

Right Honorable Lord HAWKESBURY.

Observations respecting the Navigation and Trade of the United States of America with the dominions of Great Britain.

NAVIGATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE BRITISH COLONIES.

The treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, provides for, and regulates the commercial intercourse between the territories of the former, and almost all parts of the British dominions, except those in the West Indies: the provisions concerning this branch of their navigation and trade, originally inserted in the treaty, having, on account of their inequality, been excluded, at the instance of the United States, the intercourse is open to the regulations of the respective parties.

Hitherto the United States have made no regulations upon this subject, because the regulations on the part of Great Britain, contained in the statute of the 28th of George III, c. 6, having been suspended on account of the war, the trade has been opened to, and carried on by, American as well as British ships. But, as the war is now at an end, and the suspension of the British statute may be discontinued, it becomes expedient to examine the regulations which it contains.

These regulations divide themselves into two distinct heads: the first regards the articles which may be exported from the British West Indies to the United States, and those which may be exported from thence to the British West Indies: the second regards the carriage of those articles between the United States and the British West Indies.

In respect to the first head, the United States, which offer so extensive a market to all sorts of British manufactures and productions, may reasonably expect to find, in return, a market in the British West Indies for certain articles in their power to supply with advantage, but which have hitherto been prohibited.

In respect to the second head, it may be observed that these regulations exclude the American ships from any share in the carriage of the articles referred to, by confining the same exclusively to British ships, including as well the exports of the United States to the British West Indies, as the exports from thence to the United States. The mere statement of this regulation shows its inequality; and whether it be referred to the principles of commercial reciprocity, or to those even of the navigation act of Great Britain, the inference is the same, and in favor of its revision.

"If the colonies be considered as parts of the common empire, the trade between one part and another, as between London and Kingston, in Jamaica, may be considered equally internal, as with the coasting trade between London and Liverpool, and if deemed expedient, might be restrained to domestic bottoms. But when a trade is opened between a colony and a foreign country, the case is changed: the foreign country becomes a party, and has a reciprocal claim to the use of its bottoms in the trade with the colony, as with any other part of the empire to which the colony belongs. In support of this principle, the practice of other nations in Europe may be appealed to, not one of which has refused, whenever a trade was permitted at all between the colonies and a foreign country, to make the carriage common to the vessels of both." This observation is equally applicable to the trade between the United States and the other British colonies in America, as to that between the United States and the British West Indies.

COUNTERVAILING DUTIES.

The treaty of 1794 likewise provides that the ships and merchandise of the parties shall not pay higher duties in their respective ports, than the like ships and merchandise of other nations: and as the United States had imposed a higher tonnage duty upon all foreign ships than upon American ships, as well as higher imposts upon all goods imported in such foreign ships, than upon the like goods imported in American ships, the treaty reserves to Great Britain the right to impose upon American vessels, entering the British ports in Europe, a tonnage duty equal to that payable by British ships in the ports of America, and such duty as shall be adequate to countervail the difference of duties payable on the importation of European and Asiatic goods into the United States, in British and American vessels. The manifest object of this reservation is to give a fair and equal competition to the vessels of both countries in their mutual intercourse.

The act of Parliament, passed in 1797, for carrying into execution this treaty, notwithstanding, contains regulations which, in some very important instances, defeat this object of the treaty, by establishing such duties upon American ships and cargoes, as must altogether exclude the former from the carriage of their own most bulky and valuable productions to Great Britain.

TONNAGE AND LIGHT-HOUSE DUTIES.

The tonnage duty payable by all foreign ships on their entry in the ports of America, is forty-four cents, or two shillings sterling per ton more than is payable by American ships. This duty is collected and paid into the public treasury, which is charged to nearly the same amount for the support of light-houses, beacons, and buoys, upon the coasts, and in the bays, rivers, and harbors of the United States; and being analogous to the light money paid by American ships in the ports of Great Britain, is not a duty which can, consistently with the spirit of the treaty, be countervailed: this, however, has been done; so that an American vessel entering a port in Great Britain now pays not only two shillings per ton countervailing duty, but a further sum for light money, varying in different ports, but in almost all of them double the sum paid by British ships. The remedy in this particular is, however, not difficult; as, by imposing an adequate light duty upon all ships, distinct from the present tonnage duty, the United States may not only equalize the present difference of duties, but assimilate their system to that of other nations which do not confound their light duties with the public revenue.

DUTIES ON THE CARGOES OF AMERICAN SHIPS.

The manner of countervailing the difference of duties payable upon goods imported into the United States in American and foreign vessels, has, in consequence of the conclusion of the war, become a subject of urgency and importance, and requires particular and immediate consideration.

The United States might repeal the duties liable to be countervailed, and call upon Great Britain to repeal the countervailing duties; but, as they equally affect all foreign ships, and not solely the ships of Great Britain, the repeal would be a gratuitous benefit to other nations at the expense of the American navigation.

As the articles usually exported from Great Britain to the United States are not raw materials, but finished manufactures of great value in small bulk, the American duties cannot in any considerable degree affect the navigation of either country, inasmuch as the British exports are carried to the United States in a small number of vessels, compared with those employed in the carriage of the exports of the United States: the chief competition between American and British vessels will take place, not in the carriage of the manufactures of Great Britain, but in the carriage of the bulky and raw materials exported from the United States; and this competition will not be materially affected by the duty upon the imports of the United States.

Perhaps the only just and practicable mode of exercising this countervailing right would be, to impose upon the articles exported from Great Britain to the United States in American vessels precisely the same difference of duties to which they are liable upon their importation into the United States in British and American vessels. This would put the ships of the two countries exactly upon the same footing. Without, however, stopping to discuss this point at present, it will suffice to show that the mode in which the right is exercised, by the act for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, will be productive of greater inequality than the measure was intended to correct: for, by referring to the act, it will be seen that, instead of imposing on American vessels only such disadvantages as would be adequate to balance the disadvantages imposed on British vessels, in the carriage of American and British exports, different countervailing duties are imposed upon different American articles, imported into Great Britain in American vessels, according to the importance of such articles in the internal economy of Great Britain, and the quantity of shipping employed in their transportation; and in pursuance of these principles, that the American oil and tobacco (the carriage of the last of which articles alone requires many times double the quantity of tonnage requisite for the carriage of the whole of the exports of Great Britain to the United States) have been selected as objects upon which the highest countervailing duties are imposed: the countervailing duties being upon fish oil 36*s*. $3\frac{12}{20}$ sterling per ton of two hundred and fifty-two gallons, and upon tobacco 1*s*. 6*d*. sterling per hundred.

The unequal and injurious effect of these duties, in respect to the American navigation, will be most completely exposed by a comparison of the freights of an American and British ship of the same tonnage, for performing the same service.

DUTY UPON AMERICAN FISH OIL.

Before the late war the freight of a ton of two hundred and fifty-two gallons of oil from America to Great Britain, varied from 40*s*. to 50*s*. sterling; the average freight being 45*s*. sterling; and a vessel of two hundred and fifty tons' burden carried about two hundred and fifty tons of oil.

Supposing upon the return of peace that freights fall to their former rates:

A British ship of two hundred and fifty tons arriving in Great Britain from the United States, with two hundred and fifty tons of oil, at 45*s*. per ton, will earn - - -					£625	0 0
An American ship of two hundred and fifty tons, also arriving in Great Britain, from the United States, with two hundred and fifty tons of oil, at 45*s*. per ton, will receive -	625	0	0
From which must be deducted the countervailing duty of 36*s*. $3\frac{12}{20}$ per ton, paid by the American, but not by the British ship - - - - - - - -	453	15	0
Leaving the freight earned by the American ship - - - - - - - -					171	5 0

DUTY UPON AMERICAN TOBACCO.

The tobacco exported from the United States is estimated at about one hundred thousand hogsheads annually, each hogshead containing, on an average, twelve hundred pounds. A ship of two hundred and fifty tons' burden will carry about three hundred and seventy-five hogsheads, consequently, upwards of sixty-six thousand tons of shipping are requisite to export the annual crops of American tobacco. Before the late war, this average freight, from the United States to Great Britain, was 35*s.* sterling per hogshead: the countervailing duty now imposed upon tobacco imported in American ships, and from which the same is free, when imported in British ships, is 1*s.* 6*d.* per hundred, or 18*s.* per hogshead.

The earnings of an American and British ship for the same tonnage, and for the same service, will, upon these data, stand thus:

A British ship of two hundred and fifty tons, arriving from the United States with three hundred and seventy-five hogsheads of tobacco, at 35*s.* per hogshead freight, will earn - - - -		£656 5 0
An American ship of two hundred and fifty tons, arriving in Great Britain from the United States, with three hundred and seventy-five hogsheads of tobacco, at 35*s.* per hogshead freight, will receive - - - - - - - - -	656 5 0
From which must be deducted the countervailing duty of 18*s.* per hogshead, paid by the American but not by the British ship - - - - - - - -	337 10 0
Leaving the freight earned by the American ship - - - - - - - - -		318 15 0
And making a difference of more than a hundred per cent. upon the freight of the American ship in favor of the British ship, or - - - - - - - - - - - -		£337 10 0

It seems hardly necessary to add that a law thus inconsistent with the scope and spirit of the treaty which it professes to carry into execution, calls for immediate revision.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, February 13, 1802.

SIR:

I am authorized to inform you that the British Government will, without hesitation, accede to a proposal for the abolition of all discrimination of duties affecting the navigation and commercial intercourse between our and their territories; and, in consequence of what has passed upon this subject, a motion has already been made in the House of Commons by Mr. Vansittart, of the Treasury, to bring in a bill authorizing his Majesty, at any time, after the passing of the act, by an order in council, or by proclamation, to cause the countervailing duties upon American vessels, and upon articles imported in American vessels, or either of them, or any part of the same or of either of them, wholly to cease or to be suspended, for such period or periods as may be deemed expedient. We may count with certainty upon the passage of the bill to a law, and that the extent of repeal will be made to depend upon our own choice. I have suggested the equity and importance of an immediate suspension of the countervailing duty upon tobacco; and the bill is so drawn up as leaves the Government at liberty at any time to take it off in particular cases, by an order in council, or to suspend it generally by proclamation. I have, however, received no assurance that this will be done, and we consequently must not be disappointed if it should be refused. I will resume the subject should a favorable occasion offer to do so; in the mean time, individuals may, upon the circumstances of their cases, ask for a remission of this duty.

Perhaps a future day will be named in our law, or in the proclamation, which the law may authorize, upon which our discriminating duties shall cease: due notice of such a measure would become the grounds for a correspondent abolition of the duties here.

I annex the copy of a letter sent by Lord Hawkesbury to the British commissioners, under the 7th article of the treaty of 1794; a copy of the convention, which I lately signed with his lordship, has, in like manner, been communicated by me to our commissioners. In consequence of these communications, the Board will immediately re-assemble and proceed to business.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

DOWNING STREET, Feb. 11, 1802.

GENTLEMEN:

I herewith transmit to you the copy of a convention concluded by me and Mr. King, on the 8th of January last, explanatory of the 6th and 7th articles of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with the United States; and I have to signify to you His Majesty's pleasure that you propose to the commissioners, on the part of the United States, of the Board of which you are members, to re-assemble, and proceed with you in the execution of the duties imposed upon you by the provisions of the 7th article of the said treaty, and by the third article of this convention.

I am, &c.

TO MAURICE SWABEY, L. L. D. and JOHN ANSTEY, Esq. HAWKESBURY.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, May 5, 1802.

SIR:

The bill imposing duties upon exports and imports, and the tonnage of vessels, has passed the House of Commons, and will doubtless go through the House of Lords, and receive the royal assent without alteration. If it be yet printed, I will enclose a copy thereof with this letter.

In respect to the duties on imports, the bill in effect revives the correspondent provisions of the convoy act, with the addition, in most cases, of a fifth to the duties imposed by that act. The tonnage duties, as well as the duties upon goods exported to any part of Europe, are the same as under the convoy act: the duties upon goods exported to America, and other places out of Europe, are reduced to half the rates imposed by the convoy act: and, with regard to articles excepted from the payment of duties inwards and outwards, as well as to the regulations for warehousing certain goods, and allowing drawbacks in case of re-exportation, the like provisions are contained in the present bill as were inserted in the convoy act.

In consequence of the large quantity of cotton lately imported from the United States, and the superior quality of a portion of the Georgia, it was proposed to put a higher duty upon our cotton than upon that of Turkey, which is of an inferior quality. But, on conferring with the officers charged with the settlement of these duties, the discrimination has been given up; and without distinguishing between Sea Island, and other cotton of the United States, as had at first been proposed, the duty is reduced to the lowest rate, or to that imposed upon the cotton of Turkey: and as all other cotton will pay higher duties than that of the United States and Turkey, ours will stand upon a comparatively good footing in this market. As the proposed tonnage duty upon our vessels is as low as upon the vessels of any other country, and applies to British equally with foreign vessels, so far as respects discrimination, there is nothing to complain of.

With regard to the proposed export duty, after several conferences with Mr. Vansittart, of the Treasury, to whom I was referred by Lord Hawkesbury to discuss the subject, and in which I urged, but without success, the abolition of all discrimination between the purchasers of British manufactures, I thought it my duty to write him a letter upon the subject, a copy whereof is annexed. If his answer should be received in time, a copy of it shall also be subjoined.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to Nicholas Vansittart, Esq.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, April 29, 1802.

SIR:

As several points upon which we have touched in our conversations respecting the bill before Parliament, imposing certain duties on exports and imports, and the tonnage of vessels, were the subjects of discussion when the convoy duties were imposed, I take the liberty to send you the copy of the report* which I made to my Government of the conference which on that occasion I had with Mr. Pitt, thinking this as satisfactory a mode as any I could adopt, of communicating to you the objections then made against certain of the provisions of the convoy duty, and which, so far as respects the principle of the export duties now proposed to be laid, are equally applicable to the present as to the former bill.

Without repeating what has been already said, I will beg of you to give all the weight which it deserves, to the obvious and just inference to be deduced from the spirit and tenor of our treaty of amity, &c.; and, according to which, as we think, we are not liable to pay a higher duty for permission to export your manufactures than is paid by your other customers. Agreeably to the proposed tariff, the consumers of British manufactures living in Europe will pay only half per cent. for permission to export the same, while we, who live further off, and who, consequently, pay higher freight and insurance, are required to pay double that rate, or one per cent., for the like permission.

It is true that the difference will not be as considerable as under the convoy law; but it is not against the greater or less degree, but against discrimination altogether, that we contend. When this objection was formerly pressed, it was replied, as you will perceive by the enclosed report, that the duty taken in reference to convoys, which would cost more in long than short voyages, was, for this reason, not unequitable. Whatever force there might have been in this reply, it must be admitted to have no influence whatever, in respect to the discrimination now proposed; the effect of which, in regard to American and European purchasers of British manufactures, is, that each having purchased goods upon the same terms, and of the same amount, the former is called upon before he leaves the warehouse to pay, for the Government permission to carry away his purchase, double the sum demanded of the latter for the like permission. And if the Americans be supposed to purchase British manufactures of the value of six millions annually, and it be likewise admitted that the Europeans purchase to the same amount, the former will annually pay, according to the proposed discrimination, £30,000 sterling more than the latter, or, in other words, for permission to export the same quantity of goods, the British Government will require the European purchaser to pay only £30,000, at the same time that it obliges the American purchaser to pay sixty thousand.

This discrimination is, at the same time, too plain to leave any doubt of the sentiments which it must unavoidably excite; and I cannot but flatter myself that, upon a reconsideration of the subject, it will be thought both just and prudent that every sort of discrimination and preference should be abolished.

With great consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

RANDALL'S, SURRY, July 30, 1802.

MY LORD:

Having received the leave of my Government to pass two or three months on the continent, I am desirous of conferring with your lordship before my departure, (which will take place in the course of a fortnight,) upon one or two subjects which have for some time been under your lordship's consideration. I allude to the settlement of a plan for carrying on the trade between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, and to the long expected transfer of the Maryland Bank stock. Upon each of these subjects I am in hopes your lordship will enable me to make some explicit communication to my Government, before I avail myself of the leave I have received of a temporary absence; and, for this purpose, I ask the favor of you to receive me on Wednesday, or any other day of next week which may be more convenient.

With perfect consideration, &c.

RUFUS KING.

Right Honorable Lord HAWKESBURY.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, August 2, 1802.

Lord Hawkesbury presents his compliments to Mr. King, and will be happy to have the honor of receiving him here on Wednesday next, at one o'clock, should that hour be convenient to him.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, August 10, 1802.

SIR:

As I am about to avail myself of the President's permission to pass a few weeks upon the continent, I have thought it expedient to endeavor previously to ascertain the sentiments of this Government concerning the trade and navigation between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, as well as to press for a final decision respecting the Maryland Bank stock. For these purposes, I asked a conference of Lord Hawkesbury in a note, the copy whereof is annexed. His lordship received me at the time I had proposed; but I regret that I am not able to send you a more satisfactory report of what passed on this occasion.

In respect to the bank stock, Lord Hawkesbury said he had lately received a communication from the Chancellor concerning it, and that measures should be taken to effect a transfer of the stock to the Crown, when it would be in a situation that would enable him to receive the King's pleasure respecting it. He intimated that he had understood there were other claims, besides that of the State of Maryland; but, so far as he expressed any opinion, it seemed to be, that there would be no difficulty of importance in the way of a satisfactory settlement, after the stock had been transferred to the Crown. I repeated to his lordship arguments which had been urged upon his predecessor; and tried, though without success, to obtain from him an explicit engagement that the stock should be transferred to me after its transfer to the Crown.

Respecting the West India trade, his lordship said, after a short conversation explanatory of our expectations, that he could give me no explicit information whether, or how far, they should be able to accede to our claims; the fact being, as he observed, that not only on account of the constant succession of more pressing concerns which His

* Vide my No. 74, (1st series,) dated 1st June, 1798, to Col. Pickering, with the omission of a very few words respecting the dissatisfaction likely to be produced in America by the imposition of the convoy duty, &c.

Majesty's ministers had been called upon to decide, but from the unsettled as well as uncertain condition of the West India colonies, they had not been able to go into the consideration of the regulations which it might be deemed expedient to adopt; that they were yet also to learn the real situation of St. Domingo, as well as of some other important colonies; and that, as any change in their former system would, in some sort, depend upon the probable condition not only of their own but of other colonies, they must wait a little longer before they could form a safe opinion upon this important subject.

I remarked to Lord Hawkesbury, that, on account of our just claim to an equal participation in a trade as necessary to them as to us, as well as from the tenor of the article agreed to by England, but refused by America, in the treaty of 1794, we had not expected that a recurrence would be had, at the end of the war, to the exclusive system which had prevailed before; that any considerable delay in the decision of this point would operate in the same way as a decision in favor of the old system, which, as his lordship must know, we considered as unequal and injurious; that my apprehension, therefore, was, in case of such delay, that we should think ourselves obliged to meet the disadvantages to which our navigation is liable under the former system, by regulations which would impose the like disadvantages upon the British navigation; these countervailing regulations would prove mutually, though I could not but admit they would be equally, inconvenient, and might, moreover, have the effect to disturb the harmonious and beneficial intercourse it was the common interest of the two countries to promote.

His lordship made no distinct answer to these remarks; contenting himself to repeat, in substance, what he had before observed concerning the pressure of affairs of greater interest, and the uncertain situation of the West India colonies.

As I found that I had not obtained any precise assurance upon this subject, which probably has not yet been discussed in the cabinet, I observed, that notwithstanding the question might not appear to be of equal importance with others which continue to engage the attention of the English ministry, it nevertheless had excited, and might again excite, a lively interest in the United States; that the subject had employed much of my attention, and I had sometimes flattered myself with the hope that I should, during my residence here, be enabled to assist in the equitable and satisfactory settlement of it; that I expected to terminate my mission, and return to America early in the next spring; and that it would afford me some satisfaction to be authorized to inform you that both this business, and the other regarding the Maryland Bank stock, should be decided before my departure.

Lord Hawkesbury replied that he could not officially assure me that this should be done; but that, according to his personal view of the subject, he foresaw no reason likely to delay the decision of them beyond the time I had mentioned. This vague reply, and which binds to nothing, ended our conference upon these topics.

Lord Hawkesbury then inquired of me if I had received any late intelligence concerning the expedition to Louisiana. On my answering in the negative, he said, according to their advices, the French expedition was in preparation, and that it would certainly proceed. I, in turn, asked his lordship, how far he gave credit to the rumor which has of late been circulated, that France was preparing a formidable expedition against Algiers. He answered, that the project existed; that the army would be marched into Spain, and embarked in the Spanish ports; and that Spain, though it was understood she had recently concluded peace with Algiers, would, nevertheless, be expected to aid the French with provisions, ships, and perhaps money. I did not ask whether England was likely also to be embroiled with Algiers, in consequence of the late capture of one or two English vessels by the cruisers of this regency, having understood that it is here admitted that the passes of these vessels were irregular, and that the demand of England would be confined to the liberation of the crews, leaving the vessels as forfeited to the captors.

Before leaving Lord Hawkesbury, I took occasion to observe, that, although my absence would be only for a short time, to guard against any inconvenience which it might possibly occasion, I would take the liberty, before my departure, of introducing to him Mr. Gore, one of the commissioners under the seventh article of our treaty, who would act as our chargé des affaires during my absence. His lordship replied that he should be happy to receive Mr. Gore; and I shall accordingly present him in that character to Lord Hawkesbury before I leave town. My plan is to embark at Harwich, about the 15th instant, for Holland, from thence to go to Brussels, and then, either directly to Paris, or, turning to my left, and travelling a few days on the borders of the Rhine, to proceed to Paris through some of the more eastern provinces of France. As it is the invaluable specimens of the fine arts, more than the men and manners of Paris, which I am desirous to see, a few weeks' residence there will satisfy my curiosity. I do not, therefore, think of prolonging my absence beyond the middle of November, when the new Parliament will meet, and my return hither may be a fortnight sooner.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, November 26, 1802.

SIR:

Mr. Gore has acknowledged the receipt of such letters from the Department of State as have been received during my absence; and his correspondence will have given you exact information of all that has hitherto been done towards the accomplishment of the several objects of the President's instructions. I shall immediately resume the business that has been so well commenced; and, as well from the nature of the subject, as from the temper and disposition that are understood to prevail in respect to America, I am inclined to hope that we shall experience no material difficulty in effecting a final and satisfactory adjustment of our boundaries.

Mr. King to Mr. Vansittart.

RANDALL'S, SURRY, January 8, 1803.

SIR:

After the conversation we lately had upon the subject, I will not trouble you at much length respecting the proposed augmentation of duty upon foreign spermaceti oil. Under the old system of duties, our whale fishery has not increased, while yours has extended itself so as to be able to supply more than your own consumption, which our united fisheries, a few years back, were unable to do. In these circumstances, it is proposed to raise the duty on foreign spermaceti oil from £22 3*s*. 1*d*. to £31 10*s*. the ton: the obvious effect of this measure will be to depress our whale fishery, by the entire exclusion of our spermaceti oil from your market, where it sometimes finds in small quantities a precarious sale: the proceeds of these sales are laid out in the purchase of British manufactures. "Live and let live," is a maxim of trade, and, in the present case, may mean a little more than it mutually does; for I cannot persuade myself, with the connexion that naturally subsists between us, and seeing, as we must, the efforts that France is making to acquire a control over the maritime strength of the North of Europe, as she already has done over that of the South, that the decrease of American seamen can be indifferent to Great Britain; and, if it be not, I should hope, for the sake of a common interest, that you would not, from light motives, be willing to sanction any measure that would produce this effect.

I will not recall to your recollection, by way of complaint, the various modes of encouraging your whale fishery, which, with whatever views adopted, have had the effect to withdraw from our service numbers of our most intelligent and useful adventurers.

As we have no laws prohibiting the transfer of their skill and persons to a foreign State, they were free to accept your invitation, and we could only regret their preference.

But it would be matter of greater concern, should these measures be followed up by a regulation which would still further depress our whale fishery, which cannot be beneficial to your revenue, and which is not wanted as a protection to a branch of industry, that has already not only established itself, but continues to thrive under an encouragement that has brought it to maturity.

With sentiments of respect and esteem, I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

RUFUS KING.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, January 28, 1803.

No further progress has yet been made in the discussion of the boundaries. From one or two conversations that I have had with Colonel Barclay, who has returned to town, I perceive that his opinion, whatever influence it may have, will be favorable to such a settlement of the eastern boundary as would be satisfactory to us. The chief difficulty in this settlement, that I foresee at present, respects the island of Campo Bello, which, to avoid questions of interfering jurisdiction, arising from its being to the westward of a suitable boundary line, should belong to Massachusetts: if it should be ceded, I shall have no hesitation to agree to a confirmation of the titles of the settlers derived from Nova Scotia. But the minister may hesitate about a cession.

In my last conversation with Lord Hawkesbury, respecting the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, he desired me to write him a letter upon that subject, in order that he might submit it to the consideration of the cabinet; and I accordingly sent him the letter, a copy of which is subjoined.

[Referred to in the foregoing.]

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, January 18, 1803.

MY LORD:

Referring to the observations transmitted to your lordship in my letter of the 3d of February past, explanatory of the principle upon which we claim an equal participation of the trade between the United States and the British West Indies, I take the liberty to recall the subject to your lordship's recollection, as one that has been long under consideration, and upon which I have received orders to require the decision of His Majesty's Government.

If, contrary to the maxims by which the trade of the colonies was formerly regulated, new circumstances have rendered it expedient to open an intercourse between them and a foreign State, it is this measure, and not the admission of such foreign State to a share in the trade, which breaks in upon a system that could no longer be maintained with advantage.

Such intercourse being opened, each party is alike competent to make laws for its regulation; and, as neither can claim or expect to do so exclusively of the other, such regulation becomes fit matter for mutual explanation and agreement.

In conformity with this principle, an article respecting this trade was prepared, and inserted in the treaty of 1794; although afterwards excluded at the instance of the United States, by reason of its inequality.

Should the United States (in imitation of the example set them by Great Britain) pass a law applying the same rule to British vessels which the law of Great Britain applies to those of the United States, the effect would be, that neither British nor American vessels could carry on the trade. But as flour, corn, timber, staves, and other articles of first necessity to the colonies, must be received from the United States, the American vessels would carry them to some port or island in the West Indies, belonging to a third Power, whither the British vessels would go to receive the same, carrying thither to purchase them such articles of colonial produce as are allowed to be exported to the United States. In this way an entrepôt would be formed in the West Indies for the mutual sale and purchase of these commodities; and, as the question principally regards the navigation of the two countries, it is evident that the effect of these exclusive regulations would be more beneficial to the United States than to Great Britain, inasmuch as the voyage from the United States to the place of deposit in the West Indies would be longer, and consequently would afford more employment than between such place of deposit and the British West Indies.

Notwithstanding the equity of such a law, on the part of the United States, and the probable advantage it might secure to their navigation, we have no hesitation in preferring an amicable and equal participation of the trade to the certainty even of acquiring an unequal share of it by a measure of retaliation which, being resorted to in one branch of trade, may, by one or both sides, be extended to others, and in the end might have the effect to disturb the harmony as well as the extensive and mutually beneficial intercourse between the two countries.

Whether it may be deemed more convenient to alter the existing law, on the part of Great Britain, so as to allow the trade in question to be carried on equally by American and British vessels, or to enter into a compact for this purpose, as was intended by the treaty of 1794, is not a point of material difficulty, though, in the nature of the subject, a preference seems due to an adjustment by mutual stipulation: in either mode, as a security against the extension of this trade beyond the limits which it may be desired to give it, it might be provided that the return cargoes of American vessels should be carried directly to the United States, and that they should moreover be purchased, as well as limited, by the proceeds of cargoes imported in American vessels.

With distinguished consideration, I have the honor to be your lordship's obedient and most humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

NEW YORK, July, 1803.

SIR:

I take the liberty to add a few miscellaneous articles by way of supplement to my last despatch.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

As soon as the war appeared to me unavoidable, I thought it advisable to renew the attempt to form an arrangement with the British Government for the protection of our seamen: with this view, I had several conferences both with Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Addington, who avowed a sincere disposition to do whatever might be in their power to prevent the dissatisfaction on this subject that had so frequently manifested itself during the late war. With very candid professions, I, however, found several objections in discussing the subject with the first Lord of the Admiralty. Lord Hawkesbury having promised to sign any agreement upon the subject that I should conclude with Lord St. Vincent, I endeavored to qualify and remove the objections he offered to our project: and finally, the day before I left London, Lord St. Vincent consented to the following regulations:

1. No seamen nor seafaring person shall, upon the high seas and without the jurisdiction of either party, be demanded or taken out of any ship or vessel belonging to the citizens or subjects of one of the parties, by the public or private armed ships or men of war belonging to, or in the navy of the other party; and strict orders shall be given for the due observance of this engagement.

2. Each party will prohibit its citizens or subjects from clandestinely concealing or carrying away from the territories or colonial possessions of the other, any seamen belonging to such other ports.

3. These regulations shall be in force for five years, and no longer.

On parting with his lordship, I engaged to draw up, in the form of a convention, and send him, these articles in the course of the evening, who promised to forward them, with his approbation, to Lord Hawkesbury. I accordingly prepared and sent the draught to his lordship, who sent me a letter in the course of the night, stating that on further reflection he was of opinion that the narrow seas should be expressly excepted, they having been, as his lordship remarked, immemorially considered to be within the dominions of Great Britain; that with this correction he had sent the proposed convention to Lord Hawkesbury, who, his lordship presumed, would not sign it before he should have consulted the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, Sir William Scott.

As I had supposed, from the tenor of my conferences with Lord St. Vincent, that the doctrine of the mare clausum would not be revived against us on this occasion, but that England would be content with the limited jurisdiction or dominion over the seas adjacent to her territories, which is assigned by the law of nations to other States, I was not a little disappointed on receiving this communication; and, after weighing well the nature of the principle, and the disadvantages of its admission, I concluded to abandon the negotiation, rather than to acquiesce in the doctrine it proposed to establish.

I regret not to have been able to put this business on a satisfactory footing, knowing as I do its very great importance to both parties; but I flatter myself that I have not misjudged the interests of our own country, in refusing to sanction a principle that might be productive of more extensive evils than those it was our aim to prevent.

NEUTRAL FLAG.

As it is possible that another attempt will be made during the present war to establish the rule that free bottoms make free goods, I ought not to omit the communication of the following anecdote:

Soon after the British armament in March past, Bonaparte sent his aid-de-camp du roi to Berlin, to announce his determination to occupy Hanover, and to close the Elbe against England, in the event of war. The Prussian cabinet, a thing very rarely done, immediately despatched a courier with orders to Baron Jacobi, the Prussian ambassador at London, to apprise the English Government of the views of France, to impress the dissatisfaction with which Prussia had learned them, and to offer to protect Hanover and the North of Germany, provided England would give her consent to the principle that free ships should make free goods. The English cabinet immediately replied, that the German empire is bound to protect the rights of its several members; that Hanover must therefore look to Germany, and not to England, for support; and, in respect to the proposed rule that free ships should make free goods, that no advantage nor service which could be named, would be sufficient to engage England to give it her sanction. In any circumstances, this would be the opinion of England; in the present instance, if I mistake not, the proposition was believed to have come, indirectly, from Paris.

COLONY TRADE.

In a very late conversation with Mr. Addington respecting the colony trade, he insinuated the probability that events might happen in the course of the present war, alluding, as I understood, to South America, that would enable England to form with us such commercial arrangements as would be satisfactory. As Mr. Addington meant to be obscure, I could only conjecture his meaning; and my inference was, in case of the independence of South America, that the colony system must every where be abandoned—an opinion not peculiar to Mr. Addington, but one that is entertained by the principal members of the late English ministry.

SOUTH AMERICA.

When the preliminaries of the late peace were signed, an expedition, fully prepared, was in readiness to set sail for the purpose of assisting the inhabitants of the province of Caraccas in throwing off their obedience to Spain. Trinidad was retained by England, chiefly with the view of furthering this revolt; and if Spain be drawn into the war which she will be unable to avoid, the expedition to the Caraccas will be revived. No probable change of the ministry of England will change this intention, for it is known to be the opinion of the first men of the nation that the secondary object of the present war, and one that must give England courage as well as resources to go on with the struggle, is the entire independence of South America.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

MARYLAND BANK STOCK.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, May 1, 1803.

SIR:

According to the certificate of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, the fund now standing in his name, and claimed by the State of Maryland, is composed of—

£98,518	2	9	Bank stock, worth at the present price of 170	-	-	-	£167,480	12	0
15,290	17	9	5 per cent. stock at par	-	-	-	-	-	-	15,290	17	9
4,796	2	3	Cash in the Bank of England	-	-	-	-	-	-	4,796	2	3
								Sterling,		£187,567	12	0

It will be recollected that suits in Chancery were instituted many years back against Russell and other trustees of this fund—

By Chase, agent of Maryland.

By Barclay and others, executors of Hanbury, for the two sums of eleven thousand pounds, and four hundred and forty pounds bank stock, and the accruing dividends granted to them by Maryland in 1786.

By Harford, devisee of Lord Baltimore, claiming as lord proprietor of the province of Maryland, and, as such, entitled to all forfeitures.

Besides these persons, the Ewers, and the assignee of Buchanan, have likewise respectively claimed an indemnity for losses of real estate in Maryland.

The title of Maryland has been more than once argued in the case of Barclay and others; and it has appeared to be the opinion, both of the late and present Lord Chancellor, that the Crown is legally entitled to this property. My correspondence with the Department of State has explained the means that have been employed to effect a transfer of it to Maryland, as well as the series of disappointments which has defeated them.

I have now the satisfaction to send you the copy of a letter that I have received from Lord Hawkesbury, in which the King engages, in the event of its being decided that the title to this stock has accrued and belongs to the Crown, that the same shall be transferred to the State of Maryland, together with the accumulations proceeding from the re-investment of the dividends. I likewise enclose for your information copies of the instruction given to the Attorney General relative to this stock; of the decree of the Court of Chancery, in the suit of Barclay and others, against Russell and others; and of the motion of the Attorney General, founded on the presumption that after the decree in Barclay's suit, the regular course of an information, for the purpose of vesting the stock in the Crown, would have been dispensed with by the parties consenting to receive their costs, and withdraw all opposition to the funds being disposed of as the Crown should direct.

Contrary, however, to this expectation, the solicitors of Mr. Chase and of Mr. Harford refused their consent: the motion was therefore postponed to a future day, before which I sent the two subjoined letters to Messrs. Lyons and Collyer, the solicitors of Mr. Chase, who, in consequence thereof, withdrew their opposition. Mr. Harford continued to oppose; and when the motion of the Attorney General was resumed, on the 27th past, his solicitor again refused his consent: previous, however, to his doing so, he came to me with an offer to withdraw his opposition, and consent to the motion of the Attorney General, provided I would engage to transfer to Mr. Harford ten thousand pounds bank stock. This I declined doing, with the observation that, as both the late and present Chancellor had given an opinion that, upon the dissolution of the corporation or colony of Maryland, the stock accrued as bona vacantia to the Crown; and as I held the engagement of the King to transfer the same to the State of Maryland, upon its being decided that the title to the same had accrued to the Crown, there was sufficient certainty that Maryland must ultimately, and in spite of all opposition, obtain possession of the entire fund; and although it might be some time before this could be accomplished, owing to delays which might be created, still, as the dividends would, from time to time, be reinvested, the property would in the end be received, together with compensation for its detention.

Could I have been certain that the representatives of Buchanan and of the Ewers, or that the holders of a considerable sum of the colony bills of credit, said to have been issued upon the credit of this fund, and who have petitioned the King to apply the same according to its original destination, might not have been encouraged by the settlement with Harford to pursue their opposition, unless they also were bought off, I might, for the sake of finishing a tedious business, have agreed with the Hanburys to give to Mr. Harford, according to the respective interests of the proprietors, a sum of money, or bank stock, to induce him to withdraw his opposition. But, after mature consideration of the subject, I have preferred the course which is now to be adopted.

The suit of Barclay and others having been dismissed upon the principle that the fund must by law accrue to the Crown, and the King having given his solemn engagement to transfer the same to Maryland as soon as it shall have been decided that it has so accrued, it remains only that an information be filed against all the parties hitherto in opposition, in order to obtain a decision vesting the fund in the Crown; and for this purpose it may be expedient that the solicitors of Mr. Chase be instructed to assist those of the Treasury, and the family of Hanbury, in pressing the process to a conclusion. Owing to the dispersed situation of the parties, and of the angry perseverance which influences the conduct of Mr. Harford, it may require some time to complete the business; but it is a satisfaction that we hitherto have not enjoyed, that no future change in the Court of Chancery, or in the ministry, can alter the decision of the one or the precise engagement of the other.

It would have given me great pleasure to have seen the close of a business that is of importance to the State of Maryland, and which has so constantly as well as zealously engaged my attention; but the entanglements of an intricate suit in Chancery, early and unfortunately thrown into an embarrassing situation, are reached with difficulty by diplomatic means: there have, moreover, been some difficulties in our way, which neither patience nor industry has hitherto been able to surmount. We may, I think, now put our opponents at defiance, as we at length stand on secure ground, and with a little more patience may reckon with confidence upon the attainment of our object. I shall leave with the papers of the legation such a view of the subject as I hope may enable my successor with little trouble to hasten the conclusion of this long protracted business.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, April 25, 1803.

SIR:

I have the honor to send you herewith enclosed a copy of the instruction that has been given to His Majesty's Attorney General, relative to the stock claimed by the State of Maryland; and I have the satisfaction, by His Majesty's commands, to state to you, for the information of your Government, that in the event of its being decided that the title to this stock has accrued, and belongs to His Majesty, His Majesty will cause the same to be transferred to the State of Maryland, together with the accumulations which shall have accrued from the reinvestment of the dividends; and measures to enable His Majesty to fulfil his intention, to this purpose, shall be adopted with as little delay as shall be consistent with the due observance of the forms with which it may be requisite to comply.

I flatter myself, sir, that this communication will be regarded by your Government as a new proof of His Majesty's disposition to consult and promote the interests of the United States; and I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of the high consideration with which

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

HAWKESBURY.

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. Perceval.

DOWNING STREET, December 15, 1802.

SIR:

As I understand that a cause has long been depending in the Court of Chancery, relative to a sum of money which is claimed by the State of Maryland, I have to desire that you will take such measures as may appear to you most advisable, for putting the Crown in possession of this property, in order that His Majesty may be enabled to dispose of it in such manner as he may think proper.

I am, &c.

Mr. King to Messrs. Lyon & Colyer.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, April 22, 1803.

GENTLEMEN:

Having reason to be satisfied, in the event of its being decided that the title to the stock of the Bank of England, claimed by the State of Maryland, has accrued and belongs to the Crown, that the same will be transferred to the State of Maryland, (in which case I am authorized to transfer to Mr. Chase the portion thereof to which he may be entitled,) I am of opinion that you will promote the interests of the State of Maryland and of Mr. Chase, by giving no opposition to the measures concerning this stock proposed by the Attorney General.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

RUFUS KING.

Mr. King to Messrs. Lyon & Colyer.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, April 26, 1803.

GENTLEMEN:

Since the appointment of Mr. Chase as agent of Maryland for the recovery of the bank stock claimed by that State, the business has been committed by the State of Maryland to me, as the minister of the United States in this country; and, in virtue of this authority, I took the liberty to send you my letter of the 22d instant. Perceiving that you have some hesitation in complying with the tenor of that communication, on the score that it is not sufficiently explicit and directory; in behalf of the State of Maryland and Mr. Chase, I hereby request and direct you to give your consent to the motion made in the Court of Chancery by the Attorney General, or to any other motion or process having for its object a transfer of the stock in question, to such person as the King, under his sign manual, may nominate and appoint.

With great respect, I remain, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

The ulterior provisions, also suggested in the same communication, for the occupation and government of the country, will call for early attention. Such information relative to its government, as time and distance have permitted me to obtain, will be ready to be laid before you within a few days; but as permanent arrangements for this object may require time and deliberation, it is for your consideration whether you will not forthwith make such temporary provisions for the preservation, in the mean while, of order and tranquillity in the country, as the case may require.

Treaty between the United States of America and the French republic.

The President of the United States of America, and the First Consul of the French republic, in the name of the French people, desiring to remove all source of misunderstanding, relative to objects of discussion mentioned in the second and fifth articles of the convention of (the 8th Vendemiaire, an 9,) September, 30, 1800, relative to the rights claimed by the United States, in virtue of the treaty concluded at Madrid, the 27th October, 1795, between His Catholic Majesty and the said United States, and willing to strengthen the union and friendship, which at the time of the said convention was happily re-established between the two nations, have respectively named their plenipotentiaries, to wit: The President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said States, Robert R. Livingston, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, and James Monroe, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of the said States, near the Government of the French republic; and the First Consul, in the name of the French people, citizen Francis Barbé Marbois, minister of the public treasury, who, after having respectively exchanged their full powers, have agreed to the following articles:

ART. 1. Whereas, by the article the third of the treaty concluded at St. Ildefonso, (the 9th Vendemiaire, an 9,) October 1, 1800, between the First Consul of the French Republic and His Catholic Majesty, it was agreed as follows: His Catholic Majesty promises and engages on his part to cede to the French republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions and stipulations herein, relative to his Royal Highness the Duke of Parma, the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that is now in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States: And whereas, in pursuance of the treaty, and particularly of the third article, the French republic has an incontestable title to the domain and to the possession of the said territory. The First Consul of the French republic, desiring to give to the United States a strong proof of his friendship, doth hereby cede to the said United States, in the name of the French republic, for ever and in full sovereignty, the said territory with all its rights and appurtenances, as fully and in the same manner as they have been acquired by the French republic, in virtue of the above mentioned treaty, concluded with His Catholic Majesty.

ART. 2. In the cession made by the preceding article, are included the adjacent islands belonging to Louisiana, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, and all public buildings, fortifications, barracks, and other edifices, which are not private property. The archives, papers, and documents, relative to the domain and sovereignty of Louisiana and its dependencies, will be left in the possession of the commissaries of the United States, and copies will be afterwards given in due form to the magistrates and municipal officers, of such of the said papers and documents as may be necessary to them.

ART. 3. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and, in the mean time, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

ART. 4. There shall be sent by the Government of France a commissary to Louisiana, to the end that he do every act necessary, as well to receive from the officers of His Catholic Majesty the said country and its dependencies in the name of the French republic, if it has not been already done, as to transmit it, in the name of the French public, to the commissary or agent of the United States.

ART. 5. Immediately after the ratification of the present treaty by the President of the United States, and in case that of the First Consul shall have been previously obtained, the commissary of the French republic shall remit all the military posts of New Orleans, and other parts of the ceded territory, to the commissary or commissaries named by the President to take possession of the troops, whether of France or Spain, who may be there, shall cease to occupy any military post from the time of taking possession, and shall be embarked as soon as possible in the course of three months after the ratification of this treaty.

ART. 6. The United States promise to execute such treaties and articles as may have been agreed between Spain and the tribes and nations of Indians, until, by mutual consent of the United States and the said tribes or nations, other suitable articles shall have been agreed upon.

ART. 7. As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States, to encourage the communication of both nations, for a limited time, in the country ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on, it has been agreed between the contracting parties, that the French ships coming directly from France or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of France or her said colonies, and the ships of Spain coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted during the space of twelve years in the port of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain, or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on the merchandise, or other or greater tonnage than there paid by the citizens of the United States.

During the space of time above mentioned, no other nation shall have a right to the same privileges in the ports of the ceded territory. The twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of ratifications, if it shall take place in France, or three months after it shall have been notified at Paris to the French Government, if it shall take place in the United States: it is, however, well understood, that the object of the above article is to favor the manufactures, commerce, freight, and navigation of France and of Spain, so far as relates to the importations that the French and Spanish shall make into the said ports of the United States, without in any sort affecting the regulations that the United States may make concerning the exportation of the produce and merchandise of the United States, or any right they may have to make such regulations.

ART. 8. In future and forever, after the expiration of the twelve years, the ships of France shall be treated upon the footing of the most favored nations in the ports above mentioned.

ART. 9. The particular convention signed this day by the respective ministers, having for its object to provide for the payment of debts due to the citizens of the United States by the French republic, prior to the 30th of September, 1800, (8th Vendemiaire, an 9,) is approved, and to have its execution in the same manner as if it had been inserted in the present treaty; and it shall be ratified in the same form and in the same time, so that the one shall not be ratified distinct from the other. Another particular convention, signed at the same date as the present treaty, relative to a definitive rule between the contracting parties is, in the like manner, approved, and will be ratified in the same form and in the same time, and jointly.

ART. 10. The present treaty shall be ratified in good and due form, and the ratification shall be exchanged in the space of six months after the date of the signature by the ministers plenipotentiary, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed these articles in the French and English languages, declaring, nevertheless, that the present treaty was originally agreed to in the French language, and have thereunto put their seals.

Done at Paris, the 10th day of Floreal, in the 11th year of the French republic, and the 30th April, 1803.

A Convention between the United States of America and the French republic.

The President of the United States of America, and the First Consul of the French republic, in the name of the French people, in consequence of the treaty of cession of Louisiana which has been signed this day, wishing to regulate definitively every thing which has relation to the said cession, have authorized, to this effect, the plenipotentiaries, that is to say: the President of the United States has, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said States, nominated for their plenipotentiaries, Robert R. Livingston, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, and James Monroe, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of the said United States, near the Government of the French republic; and the First Consul of the French republic, in the name of the French people, has named, as plenipotentiary of the said republic, the citizen Francis Barbé Marbois, who, in virtue of their full powers, which have been exchanged this day, have agreed to the following articles:

ART. 1. The Government of the United States engages to pay to the French Government, in the manner specified in the following article, the sum of sixty millions of francs, independent of the sum which shall be fixed by another convention for the payment of the debts due by France to citizens of the United States.

ART. 2. For the payment of the sum of sixty millions of francs, mentioned in the preceding article, the United States shall create a stock of eleven million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable, half-yearly, in London, Amsterdam, or Paris, amounting, by the half-year, to three hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, according to the proportions which shall be determined by the French Government, to be paid at either place: the principal of the said stock to be reimbursed at the treasury of the United States in annual payments of not less than three millions of dollars each, of which the first payment shall commence fifteen years after the date of the exchange of ratifications: this stock shall be transferred to the Government of France, or to such person or persons as shall be authorized to receive it, in three months, at most, after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, and after Louisiana shall be taken possession of in the name of the Government of the United States.

It is further agreed that, if the French Government should be desirous of disposing of the said stock, to receive the capital in Europe at shorter terms, that its measures, for that purpose, shall be taken so as to favor, in the greatest degree possible, the credit of the United States, and to raise to the highest price the said stock.

ART. 3. It is agreed that the dollar of the United States, specified in the present convention, shall be fixed at five francs $\frac{3333}{10000}$, or five livres eight sous tournoise.

The present convention shall be ratified in good and due form, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the space of six months, to date from this day, or sooner if possible.

In faith of which, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the above articles, both in the French and English languages, declaring, nevertheless, that the present treaty has been originally agreed on and written in the French language, to which they have hereunto affixed their seals.

Convention between the French republic and the United States of America.

The President of the United States of America, and the First Consul of the French republic, in the name of the French people, having, by a treaty of this date, terminated all difficulties relative to Louisiana, and established on a solid foundation the friendship which unites the two nations, and being desirous, in compliance with the second and fifth articles of the convention of the 8th Vendemiaire, 9th year of the French republic, (30th September, 1800,) to secure the payment of the sum due by France to the citizens of the United States, have respectively nominated as plenipotentiaries, that is to say: the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, Robert R. Livingston, minister plenipotentiary, and James Monroe, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of the said States, near the Government of the French republic; and the First Consul, in the name of the French people, the citizen Francis Barbé Marbois, minister of the public treasury, who, after having exchanged their full powers, have agreed to the following articles:

ART 1. The debts due by France to citizens of the United States, contracted before the 8th of Vendemiaire, 9th year of the French republic, (30th September, 1800,) shall be paid according to the following regulations, with interest at six per cent., to commence from the periods when the accounts and vouchers were presented to the French Government.

ART. 2. The debts provided for by the preceding article are those whose result is comprised in the conjectural note annexed to the present convention, and which, with the interest, cannot exceed the sum of twenty millions of francs. The claims comprised in the said note, which fall within the exceptions of the following articles, shall not be admitted to the benefit of this provision.

ART. 3. The principal and interest of the said debts shall be discharged by the United States by orders drawn by their ministers plenipotentiary on their treasury; these orders shall be payable sixty days after the exchange of ratifications of the treaty and the conventions signed this day, and after possession shall be given of Louisiana by the commissaries of France to those of the United States.

ART. 4. It is expressly agreed that the preceding articles shall comprehend no debts but such as are due to citizens of the United States who have been and are yet creditors of France for supplies, for embargoes, and prizes made at sea, in which the appeal has been properly lodged, within the time mentioned in the said convention of the 8th Vendemiaire, 9th year, (30th September, 1800.)

ART. 5. The preceding articles shall apply only, 1st. to captures of which the council of prizes shall have ordered restitution, it being well understood that the claimant cannot have recourse to the United States, otherwise than he might have had to the Government of the French republic, and only in case of the insufficiency of the captors; 2dly, the debts mentioned in the said fifth article of the convention contracted before the 8th Vendemiaire, an 9, (30th September, 1800,) the payment of which has been heretofore claimed of the actual Government of France, and for which the creditors have a right to the protection of the United States. The said fifth article does not comprehend prizes whose condemnation has been or shall be confirmed. It is the express intention of the contracting parties not to extend the benefit of the present convention to reclamations of American citizens, who shall have established houses of commerce in France, England, or other countries than the United States, in partnership with foreigners, and who, by that reason, and the nature of their commerce, ought to be regarded as domiciliated in the places where such houses exist. All agreements and bargains concerning merchandise, which shall not be the property of American citizens, are equally excepted from the benefit of the said convention; saving, however, to such persons their claims in like manner as if this treaty had not been made.

ART. 6. And that the different questions which may arise under the preceding article may be fairly investigated, the ministers plenipotentiary of the United States shall name three persons, who shall act from the present, and provisionally, and who shall have full power to examine, without removing the documents, all the accounts of the different claims already liquidated by the bureaux established for this purpose by the French republic, and to ascertain whether they belong to the classes designated by the present convention, and the principles established in it; or if they are not in one of its exceptions, and on their certificate declaring that the debt is due to an American citizen, or his representative, and that it existed before the 8th Vendemiaire, 9th year, (30th September, 1800,) the debtor shall be entitled to an order on the treasury of the United States, in the manner prescribed by the third article.

ART. 7. The same agents shall likewise have power, without removing the documents, to examine the claims which are prepared for verification, and to certify those which ought to be admitted by uniting the necessary qualifications, and not being comprised in the exceptions contained in the present convention.

ART. 8. The same agents shall likewise examine the claims which are not prepared for liquidation, and certify in writing those which, in their judgments, ought to be admitted to liquidation.

ART. 9. In proportion as the debts mentioned in these articles shall be admitted, they shall be discharged with interest at six per cent. by the treasury of the United States.

ART. 10. And that no debt, which shall not have the qualifications above mentioned, and that no unjust or exorbitant demand may be admitted, the commercial agent of the United States at Paris, or such other agent as the minister plenipotentiary of the United States shall think proper to nominate, shall assist at the operations of the bureaux, and co-operate in the examination of the claims. And if this agent shall be of opinion that any debt is not completely proved, or if he shall judge that it is not comprised in the principles of the fifth article above mentioned, and if, notwithstanding his opinion, the bureaux established by the French Government should think that it ought to be liquidated, he shall transmit his observations to the Board established by the United States, who, without removing documents, shall make a complete examination of the debt, and vouchers which support it, and report the result to the minister of the United States. The minister of the United States shall transmit his observations in all such cases to the minister of the treasury of the French republic, on whose report the French Government shall decide definitively in every case.

The rejection of any claim shall have no other effect than to exempt the United States from the payment of it; the French Government reserving to itself the right to decide definitively on such claims, so far as it concerns itself.

ART. 11. Every necessary decision shall be made in the course of a year, to commence from the exchange of ratification, and no reclamation shall be admitted afterwards.

ART. 12. In case of claims for debts contracted by the Government of France with citizens of the United States since the 8th Vendemiaire, 9th year, (September 30, 1800,) not being comprised in this convention, may be pursued, and the payment demanded in the same manner as if it had not been made.

ART. 13. The present convention shall be ratified in good and due form, and the ratification shall be exchanged in six months from the date of the signature of the ministers plenipotentiary, or sooner, if possible.

In faith of which, the respective ministers plenipotentiary have signed the above articles, both in the French and English languages, declaring, nevertheless, that the present treaty has been originally agreed on and written in the French language, to which they have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Paris, the 10th day of Floreal, 11th year of the French republic, (30th of April, 1803.)

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, March 29, 1801.

DEAR SIR:

In confirmation of the rumors of the day, Carnot's answer to Bailleul, published during the exile of the former, states the project which had been discussed in the Directory, to obtain from Spain a cession of Louisiana and the Floridas. A reference to that performance, copies of which I at the time sent to the Department of State, will show the manner in which it was expected to obtain the consent of Spain, as well as afford a clue to the views of France in seeking this establishment. What was then meditated, has, in all probability, since been executed. The cession of Tuscany to the Infant, Duke of Parma, by the treaty between France and Austria, forms a more compact and valuable compensation to this branch of the House of Spain than was formerly thought of; and adds very great credit to the opinion which, at this time, prevails, both at Paris and London, that Spain has in return actually ceded Louisiana and the Floridas to France. There is reason to know that it is the opinion of certain influential persons in France, that nature has marked a line of separation between the people of the United States living upon the two sides of the range of mountains which divides their territory. Without discussing the considerations which are suggested in support of this opinion, or the false consequences, as I wish to believe them, deduced from it, I am apprehensive that this cession is intended to have, and may actually produce, effects injurious to the union and consequent happiness of the people of the United States. Louisiana and the Floridas may be given to the French emigrants, as England once thought of giving them to the American tories; or, they may constitute the reward of some of the armies which can be spared at the end of the war.

I hear that General Collot, who was a few years ago in America, and a traveller in the Western country, and who for some time has been in disgrace and confinement in France, has been lately set at liberty; and that he, with a considerable number of disaffected and exiled Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen, is soon to proceed from France to the United States. Whether their voyage has any relation to the cession of Louisiana, is a matter of mere conjecture; but having heard of it in connexion with that project, I think proper to mention it to you.

What effect a plain and judicious representation upon this subject, made to the French Government by a minister of talents and entitled to confidence, would be likely to have, is quite beyond any means of judging which I possess; but on this account, as well as others of importance, it is a subject of regret that we have not such a character at this time at Paris.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Extract:—Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, June 1, 1801.

On this occasion, among other topics of conversation, his lordship [Hawkesbury] introduced the subject of Louisiana. He had, from different quarters, received information of its cession to France, and very unreservedly expressed the reluctance with which they should be led to acquiesce in a measure that might be followed by the most important consequences. The acquisition might enable France to extend her influence, and perhaps her dominion up the Mississippi; and through the lakes even to Canada. This would be realizing the plan, to prevent the accomplishment of which, the seven years' war took place; besides, the vicinity of the Floridas to the West Indies, and the facility with which the trade of the latter might be interrupted, and the islands even invaded, should the transfer be made, were strong reasons why England must be unwilling that the territory should pass under the dominion of France. As I could not mistake his lordship's object in speaking to me on this subject, I had no difficulty or reserve in expressing my private sentiments respecting it; taking, for my text, the observation of Montesquieu, "that it is happy for trading Powers, that God has permitted Turks and Spaniards to be in the world, since of all nations they are the most proper to possess a great empire with insignificance." The purport of what I said was, that we are contented that the Floridas remain in the hands of Spain, but should not be willing to see them transferred, except to ourselves.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Extract:—Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, June 9, 1801.

On different occasions since the commencement of the French revolution, opinions and reports have prevailed that some part of the Spanish possessions, including New Orleans and the mouth of the Mississippi, had been or was to be transferred to France. Of late, information has been received through several channels, making it probable that some arrangement for that purpose has been concerted. Neither the extent of the cession, however, nor the consideration on which it is made, is yet reduced to certainty and precision. The whole subject will deserve and engage your early and vigilant inquiries, and may require a very delicate and circumspect management. What the motives of Spain in this transaction may be, is not so obvious. The policy of France in it, so far, at least, as relates to the United States, cannot be mistaken. Whilst she remained on the footing of confidence and affection with the United States, which originated during our revolution, and was strengthened during the early stages of her own, it may be presumed that she adherred to the policy which, in the treaty of 1778, renounced the acquisition of continental territory in North America; and was more disposed to shun the collisions threatened by possessions in that quarter, coterminous with ours, than to pursue objects to which the commanding position at the mouth of the Mississippi might be made subservient. Circumstances are not now the same. Although the two countries are again brought together by stipulations of amity and commerce, the confidence and cordiality which formerly subsisted have had a deep wound from the occurrences of late years. Jealousies probably still remain, that the Atlantic States have a partiality for Great Britain, which may, in future, throw their weight into the scale of that rival. It is more than possible, also, that, under the influence of those jealousies, and of the alarms which have at times prevailed, of a projected operation for wresting the mouth of the Mississippi into the hands of Great Britain, she may have concluded a pre-occupancy of it by herself to be a necessary safeguard against an event from which that nation would derive the double advantage of strengthening her hold on the United States, and of adding to her commerce a monopoly of the immense and fertile region communicating with the sea through a single outlet. This view of the subject, which suggests the difficulty which may be found in diverting France from the object, points, at the same time, to the means that may most tend to induce a voluntary relinquishment of it. She must infer, from our conduct and our communications, that the Atlantic States are not disposed to enter, nor are in danger of being drawn, into partialities towards Great Britain unjust or injurious to France; that our political and commercial interests afford a sufficient guaranty against such a State of things; that, without the co-operation of the United States, Great Britain is not likely to acquire any part of the Spanish possessions on the Mississippi; and that the United States never have favored, nor, so long as they are guided by the clearest policy, ever can favor, such a project. She must be led to see again, and with a desire to shun, the danger of collisions between the two republics, from the contact of their territories; and from the conflicts in their regulations of a commerce involving the peculiarities which distinguish that of the Mississippi. Such are the general observations which the President has thought it proper should be communicated to you; that, knowing the light in which the subject is viewed by him, you may be less in danger of presenting it in any other. It is not expected that you will have occasion to make any positive use of them in relation to the councils of the French republic, the minister to which will be charged with that task. In relation to the Spanish Government, although the chief difficulty is not supposed to lie there, the President wishes you to cultivate a favorable disposition, by every proper demonstration of the preference given by the United States to the neighborhood of that of every other nation. This may be the more important, as it is not improbable that her councils also may have been affected by rumors of proceedings in this country, connected with schemes of Great Britain for getting possession of New Orleans.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, September 28, 1801.

You have been already informed of the intention of the President that your departure from France should be hastened, and that you would be furnished with a passage in the Boston frigate, which, after landing you at Bordeaux, is to proceed to the Mediterranean.

From different sources information has been received that, by some transaction concluded, or contemplated between France and Spain, the mouth of the Mississippi, with certain portions of adjacent territory, is to pass from the hands of the latter to the former nation. Such a change of our neighbors in that quarter is of too momentous concern not to have engaged the most serious attention of the Executive. It was, accordingly, made one of the subjects of instruction to Mr. Charles Pinckney, our minister plenipotentiary to the court of Spain. You will find an extract of the passage hereto annexed, No. 1. A paragraph connected with the same subject, in a letter to Mr. King, is also extracted and annexed, No. 2. In these extracts you will see the ideas entertained by the Executive, and the general considerations which, it is presumed, will have most tendency to dissuade the parties from adhering to their object. As soon as you shall have prepared the way by the necessary inquiries at Paris, it will be proper for you to break the subject to the French Government, and to make the use of these considerations most likely to give them their full weight. You will probably find it advantageous to press, in a particular manner, the anxiety of the United States to maintain harmony and confidence with the French republic, the danger to which these will be exposed by collisions, more or less inseparable from a neighborhood under such circumstances, and the security which France ought to feel that it cannot be the interest of this country to favor any voluntary or compulsive transfer of the possessions in question from Spain to France.

Among other topics to be employed on the occasion, you may, perhaps, find it eligible to remark on the frequent recurrence of war between France and Great Britain, the danger to which the Western settlements of the United States would be subject of being embroiled by military expeditions between Canada and Louisiana, the inquietudes which would be excited in the Southern States, whose numerous slaves have been taught to regard the French as the patrons of their cause, and the tendency of a French neighborhood, on this and other accounts, to inspire jealousies and apprehensions which may turn the thoughts of our citizens towards a closer connexion with her rival, and possibly produce a crisis in which a very valuable part of her dominions would be exposed to the joint operation of a naval and territorial power. Suggestions of these kinds must be managed with much delicacy; or rather the expediency of hazarding them at all, as well as the manner of doing it, must be left to your own information and discretion.

Should it be found that the cession from Spain to France has irrevocably taken place, or certainly will take place, sound policy will require, in that state of things, that nothing be said or done which will unnecessarily irritate our future neighbors, or check the liberality which they may be disposed to exercise in relation to the trade and navigation through the mouth of the Mississippi; every thing being equally avoided, at the same time, which may compromit the rights of the United States beyond those stipulated in the treaty between them and Spain. It will be proper, on the contrary, to patronize the interests of our Western fellow-citizens, by cherishing in France every just and liberal disposition towards their commerce. In the next place, it will deserve to be tried whether France cannot be induced to make over to the United States the Floridas, if included in the cession to her from Spain, or at least West Florida, through which several of our rivers, particularly the important river Mobile, empty themselves into the sea. Such a proof, on the part of France, of good will toward the United States, would contribute to reconcile the latter to an arrangement in itself much disrelished by them, and to strengthen the returning friendship between the two countries; and, by affording a fund for indemnifying and soothing our fellow-citizens who have suffered from her wrongs, would, in that view, also, be a measure founded not less in an enlarged policy, than in solid justice. The great importance of West Florida to the United States recommends to your patriotism the prudent use of every fair consideration which may favor the attainment of the object.

These ideas suppose that the cession to the United States is to be obtained from the single will of France. But it may happen that the Floridas are so far suspended, on unfinished negotiations between her and Spain, as to admit or require the concurrence of both in gratifying the wishes of the United States. In this state of things, France may yield to the considerations suggested with less of concession and reluctance; and as Spain, too, must feel an interest in the good will of the United States, and is responsible, in justice, for very considerable depredations on their commerce, there may be the greater possibility of her joining in the measure.

Should the Floridas neither have been ceded to France, nor be an acquisition contemplated by her, still it will be material, considering her intimate and influential relations to Spain, to dispose her to favor experiments on the part of the United States, for obtaining from Spain the cession in view. The interest which the latter has in cultivating our friendly dispositions, and the obligation she is under to satisfy our claims for spoliations, for doing which no other mode may be so convenient to her, are motives to which an appeal may be made with no inconsiderable force. Mr. Pinckney is accordingly to avail himself of the most auspicious occasions for sounding and exciting the dispositions of the Spanish Government on this subject; and your efforts at Paris cannot be too attentively combined with his at Madrid, as well on the last supposition that Spain alone is to make the cession, as on the former, that France is to have a direct share in the transaction. Mr. Pinckney's instructions will relate to each alternative, and you will be sensible of the advantages of such a correspondence between you as will give the proper concert to your operations.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated

LONDON, November 20, 1801.

SIR:

If the annexed copy of the treaty between France and Spain, respecting the establishment of the Prince of Parma in Tuscany, be genuine, of which I have no reason to doubt, you will perceive the value which these Powers seem to have placed upon Louisiana; the cession whereof to France is confirmed by the seventh article of this treaty.

I am in hopes that I shall be able to obtain and send you a copy of the treaty ceding Louisiana to France: this would enable us to determine whether it includes New Orleans and the Floridas.

There is, doubtless, an understanding between England and France in respect to the expedition now nearly ready to proceed to Saint Domingo: and I think I am not mistaken in the belief, whatever may be the intentions of France in respect to the occupation of Louisiana, that no part of the forces now collecting, and which are going to Saint Domingo, will be employed for this purpose.

It is not a little extraordinary that during the whole negotiation between France and England not a word was mentioned on either side respecting Louisiana, though this Government was not ignorant of the views of France in this quarter.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

[TRANSLATION.]

A treaty signed at Madrid the 21*st of March*, 1801, by the Prince of Peace and Lucien Bonaparte.

The First Consul of the French republic and His Catholic Majesty, desiring to make a final determination of the estates which are to be given to the son of the Infant, the Duke of Parma, and brother of the Queen of Spain, having duly empowered citizen Bonaparte and the Prince of Peace, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The reigning Duke of Parma, for himself and his heirs, renounces forever the Duchy of Parma, with all its dependencies, in favor of the French republic, and His Most Catholic Majesty guaranties this reconciliation. The Grand Duchy of Tuscany (renounced by the Grand Duke, and his reconciliation being guarantied by the Emperor of Germany) shall be possessed by the son of the Duke of Parma, in compensation for the estates ceded by the infant, his father, in virtue of a treaty previously concluded between His Most Catholic Majesty and the First Consul of the French republic.

ART. II. The Prince of Parma shall proceed to Florence, where he will be acknowledged as the sovereign of all the domains appertaining to the Grand Duchy, and shall receive, in the most formal manner, from the constituted authorities of the country, the keys of the fortresses, and the oath of fealty, which will be due to him as sovereign. The First Consul will contribute all in his power to the pacific consummation of this act.

ART. III. The Prince of Parma shall be recognised as the King of Tuscany, and shall be entitled to the honors due to royalty; and the First Consul shall cause him to be acknowledged and treated as King by other Powers; and this shall be done before taking possession.

ART. IV. That part of the Isle of Elba which appertains to Tuscany, shall be ceded to the French republic; and, as an equivalent, the First Consul shall give to the King of Tuscany the principality of Piambin, which belonged to the King of Naples.

ART. V. This treaty being in consequence of that already concluded between the First Consul and His Most Catholic Majesty, by which the King cedes to France the possession of Louisiana, the contracting parties agree to carry the said treaty into execution, and to arrange it in conformity to their respective rights.

ART. VI. The House which is about to be established in Tuscany being of the family of Spain, these States shall be considered as the property of Spain, and one of the infants of that family shall always reign there; and in case the succession of the King who takes possession shall fail, it shall be supplied by one of the sons of the reigning House of Spain.

ART. VII. The First Consul and His Most Catholic Majesty, in consideration of the reigning Duke of Parma, will concert in favor of his son a suitable indemnity in possession or in rents.

ART. VIII. This treaty shall be ratified within the term of three weeks, or, in case of failure, shall no longer be in force.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 10, 1801.

I found, from a variety of sources here, and some I think I can depend on, the business of Louisiana had been concluded, and it was understood it had been given in exchange for the Spanish port of St. Domingo, to be restored to its old master. Several circumstances concurred to induce me to believe this report was not void of truth. I, therefore, took the earliest opportunity to touch upon that subject with the minister, and to hint at the reason of policy (as it respected the French Government, as well as ourselves) that made the object interesting to us. He seemed at first inclined to waive the subject; but when he found I pressed more closely, he admitted that it had been a subject of conversation, but nothing had been concluded, or even resolved on, in that affair. I left him with a hint that perhaps both France and Spain might find a mutual interest in ceding the Floridas to the United States.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 12, 1801.

In addition to what I wrote you yesterday, I have only to mention, that I am more and more confirmed, notwithstanding what I there say of the minister's assurance, that Louisiana is a favorite object, and that they will be unwilling to part with it on the condition I mentioned. Speaking of the means of paying their debts to one of their ministers, yesterday, I hinted at this. His reply was, "none but spendthrifts satisfy their debts by selling their lands;" adding, however, after a short pause, "but it is not ours to give."

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to Mr. King, minister to England.

PARIS, December 30, 1801.

Among the objects that would most naturally engage my attention on my arrival, was the state of the negotiation between France and Spain, regarding Louisiana; with a view, if it had not been concluded on, to throw obstacles in the way, so far as it could be advantageously done; or, if it had been effected, to make some such arrangements as would lessen the inconveniences which might result from it to our Western territory. I have, however, reason to think the whole business had been settled before my arrival. I took occasion, on my first private audience of the Minister of Exterior Relations, to press him directly upon the subject, taking the common reports as a foundation for my inquiry. He explicitly denied that any thing had been concluded, but admitted that it had been a subject of conversation. I know, however, from a variety of channels, that it is not a mere matter of conversation, but that the exchange has actually been agreed upon; that the armament destined, in the first instance, for Hispaniola, is to proceed to Louisiana, provided Toussaint makes no opposition. General Collot, whom you may have seen in America, was originally intended for Governor of that province, but he is, at present, out of favor. I think it probable the minister will justify his concealment to me, by its not having been definitively closed with Spain, as this, though determined between the two Governments, may form an article in the general treaty. His absence (being at Lyons) prevents my coming to something more explicit with him. That Spain has made this cession, (which contravenes all her former maxims of policy,) cannot be doubted; but she is no longer a free agent.

I wish to know from you in what light this is seen by England. It will certainly, in its consequences, be extremely dangerous to her, as it will give an almost unbounded power to her rival.

It puts Spain in a perpetual state of pupilage, since she must always tremble for the safety of her colonies, in case of rupture. To avoid this evil, she must grant every commercial and political advantage to France. Her manufactures will find their way, through this channel, into every part of the Spanish territory, to the exclusion of those of Britain. Our own Western territory may be rendered so dependent upon them as to promote their political views, while the interest they have always nurtured with the Indians, and the national character of the peasantry of Canada, may render the possessions of Britain very precarious, to say nothing of the danger which must threaten her islands in case a respectable establishment should be made by France in Louisiana, which will not fail to be the case, as the territory is uncommonly fine, and produces sugar, and every article now cultivated in the islands.

I suggest these hints, that they, with many others which may occur to you, may be made use of with the British ministry, to induce them to throw all the obstacles in their power in the way of a final settlement of this business, if it is not already too late. You know, however, the importance of not appearing yourself, or permitting me to appear much opposed to it, if you find the thing concluded, since it might be made use of to embroil us with France, and Britain will have sufficient address to endeavor to keep up a mutual jealousy, if possible, between us.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 31, 1801.

The business of Louisiana is very disagreeable to Spain, as far as I can learn. If it should be equally so to Britain, perhaps it may meet with some obstacles. It is a very favorite measure here. Marbois told me yesterday it was considered important to have an outlet for their turbulent spirits; yet would not explicitly acknowledge that the business had been concluded.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, January 13, 1802.

My former letters left you little doubt on the subject of the cession of Louisiana. By the enclosed copy of the late treaty between France and Spain, you will find that it is a transaction of pretty long standing.*

The absence of the minister prevents my applying to him for the former treaty, which he will hardly know how to give me after absolutely denying that any had been formed on the subject. By the secrecy and duplicity practised relative to this object, it is clear to me that they apprehend some opposition, on the part of America, to their plans. I have, however, upon all occasions, declared that, as long as France conforms to the existing treaty between us and Spain, the Government of the United States does not consider herself as having any interest in opposing the exchange. The evil our country has suffered by their rupture with France is not to be calculated. We have become an object of jealousy both to the Government and people.

The reluctance we have shown to a renewal of the treaty of 1778, has created many suspicions. Among other absurd ones, they believe seriously that we have an eye to the conquest of their islands. This business of Louisiana also originated in that; and they say expressly, that they could have had no pretence, so far as related to the Floridas, to make this exchange, had the treaty been renewed, since by the sixth article they were expressly prohibited from touching the Floridas. I own I have always considered this article and the guaranty of our independence as more important to us than the guaranty of the islands was to France; and the sacrifices we have made, of an immense claim, to get rid of it as a dead loss. We must calculate upon every effort from every maritime Power in Europe to diminish our commerce. France has already excluded us from her African colonies. Her premiums will exclude our oil; and her heavy duties upon tobacco in foreign bottoms will prevent our carrying that article for ourselves. She refuses to naturalize our ships; so that a very large capital in that article will sink in our hands. The American Government have it in their power to counteract these measures; but they must do it instantly and decidedly, so as to show that measures of hostility to her commerce will not produce the effect contemplated by the nations of Europe. Let the United States impose a duty upon special articles, of her own produce, exported in foreign bottoms, equivalent to the difference of duty paid in Europe on such articles when imported in American or national vessels. This will secure to us the carriage of our own articles; first, because we can carry cheaper; and, second, because this duty being paid in advance imposes a greater burden than one that is paid out of the sale of the produce.

Extract:—Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, January 15, 1802.

I have before mentioned to you that the cession of Louisiana (of which it seems to me we can have no doubt, notwithstanding what may be said to amuse us) was not once a topic of inquiry or discussion in the negotiation of the preliminaries; and, for the same reason that it was not heard of on that occasion, Lord Hawkesbury has recently informed me that it had not been, and would not be, mentioned at Amiens. It is impossible for me to suspect collusion in this affair, and my persuasion, after the most careful attention, is, that England abstains from mixing herself in it, precisely from those considerations which have led her to acquiesce in others of great importance to the balance of Europe, as well as her own repose, and upon which she has been altogether silent.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Extract:—Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, February 5, 1802.

I have seen a letter, dated Paris, February 26, which says, it is definitively settled to send a colony to Louisiana and Florida. General Bernadotte is to have the direction and command of it: preparations are making for the first expedition, whose departure will perhaps depend upon the accounts expected from St. Domingo. It is asserted that the Indian nations, adjoining to Florida, have agents, now here, for the purpose of making treaties with this country to unite themselves with the troops and settlers that may be sent from hence. The establishment of this colony is a darling object, and will be pursued with ardor and upon a great scale, unless the affairs of St. Domingo shall, for the moment, derange the plan. Louisiana, Guiana, and the desert island of Tristan de Cunha, are each spoken of as places to which the rebellious and untractable negroes and people of color may be sent from St. Domingo and the other French colonies.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, February 26, 1802.

On the subject of Louisiana, I have nothing new. The establishment is disapproved by every statesman here as one that will occasion a great waste of men and money, excite enmities with us, and produce no possible advantage to the nation. But it is a scheme to which the First Consul is extremely attached; and it must, of course, be supported. You will find, by the enclosed note, that I have pressed an explanation on the subject, but I have received no answer. I have it, however, through a friend, from the First Consul, that it is by no means their intention to obstruct the navigation of the Mississippi, or violate our treaty with Spain. General Bernadotte is understood to be designated for the command, and to have asked ten thousand troops.

[Enclosed in Mr. Livingston's despatch of February 26, 1802.]

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations, dated

FEBRUARY 20, 1802.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, has seen, with some concern, the reserve of the French Government, with respect to the cession they have received from Spain of Louisiana.

He had hoped that they would have found a propriety in making such frank and open communications to him as would have enabled him to satisfy the Government of the United States that neither their boundary, nor the navigation of the Mississippi, secured by their treaties with Spain, would be, in any way, affected by the measure. It would also have been very satisfactory to him to have taken such arrangements with the Minister of Exterior Relations as would have had a tendency to dissipate the alarms the people of the Western territory of the United States will not fail to feel on the arrival of a large body of French troops in their vicinity; alarms which will probably be increased by the exertions of those Powers that are interested in keeping the two republics from cementing their connexion. The policy of the former Government of France led it to avoid all ground of controversy with the United States, not only by declining to possess any territory in their neighborhood, but by stipulating never to hold any. The undersigned does not, by this reference to the sixth article of the treaty of 1778, mean to reclaim any rights under it, since, by the convention of Paris, 30th September, 1800, it is understood to be revoked; but merely to lead the French Government to reflect how far a regard to the same policy might render it conducive to the mutual interest of both nations to cover, by a natural barrier, their possessions in America, as France has invariably sought to do in Europe.

The undersigned prays the Minister of Exterior Relations (if the request is not inconsistent with the views of the Government) to inform him whether East and West Florida, or either of them, are included in the treaty made between France and Spain; and to afford him such assurances, with respect to the limits of their territory and the navigation of the Mississippi, heretofore agreed on between Spain and the United States, as may prove satisfactory to the latter.

If the territories of East and West Florida should be included within the limits of the cession obtained by France, the undersigned desires to be informed how far it would be practicable to make such arrangements between their respective Governments as would, at the same time, aid the financial operations of France, and remove, by a strong natural boundary, all future causes of discontent between her and the United States. The undersigned embraces this opportunity of renewing to the Minister of Exterior Relations his, &c. &c.

LONDON, February 27, 1802.

SIR:

From all I can gather upon the subject, we may consider the cession of Louisiana and the Floridas as an affair decided. Without doubt, you are fully aware of its various and extensive consequences. Has it occurred to you that the French Government will probably send thither a large body of people from France, and that it may add to them all the refractory and discontented blacks and persons of color of their West India colonies?

With perfect respect and esteem, &c.

RUFUS KING.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, March 15, 1802.

SIR:

After closing my packet, I received the note of which the within is a copy. It amounts to nothing, but must serve to keep me quiet a few days longer, till they see what turn the business takes at Amiens, which becomes more and more doubtful. The bad news from St. Domingo also renders it necessary to keep us in suspense. I have already expressed my fear that American property in the islands will not be very safe; and the passage in Le Clerc's letter relative to the powder and arms may serve as an apology.

I am, sir, &c.

Le Ministre des Relations Extérieures, de la république Française, à Monsieur Livingston, Ministre Plenipotentiare des Etats Unis.

PARIS, 23*d Ventose*, (13*th March*,) an 10.

MONSIEUR:

J'ai reçu les différentes notes que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de m'addresser sur l'affaire des créances, et des prises Americaines; et j'en ai fait l'objet d'un rapport pour le Premier Consul. Je m'empresserai de vous informer de la décision qu'il aura prise.

Ne doutez pas, monsieur, que des questions qui concernent les Etats Unis, et qui ont pour objet de regler quelques uns de leurs rapports avec la France, ne soient examinées avec beaucoup d'intérêt et d'attention.

Agréez, monsieur, les assurances de ma haute considération.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

[TRANSLATION.]

PARIS, March 13, year 10.

SIR:

I have received the different notes which you have done me the honor to address to me, relating to the debts, and to the American captures; and I have made them the subject of a report to the First Consul. As soon as his decision shall be made, I will hasten to inform you of the result.

Do not doubt, sir, that the questions which concern the United States, the determination of which may affect their relations with France, will be examined with equal interest and attention.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my high consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 16, 1802.

The subject of your letter to Mr. King, of the 30th of December, is regarded by the President as not less delicate than you have supposed. Considering the particular views which Great Britain may mingle with ours, and the danger that a confidential resort to her may be abused, for the purpose of sowing jealousies in France, and thereby thwart our object, you and Mr. King will both be sensible that too much circumspection cannot be employed.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, March 24, 1802.

On the business of Louisiana they have, as yet, not thought it proper to give me any explanations, though I have omitted no opportunity to press the subject in conversation, and ultimately, by the note sent you on the 25th of February, (a duplicate of which was forwarded on the 28th,) with the copy of another note enforcing the above, to which I have, as yet, received no answer.

The fact is, they believe us to be certainly hostile to this measure, and they mean to take possession of it as early as possible, and with as little notice to us as they can.

They are made to believe this is one of the most fertile and important countries in the world; that they have a much greater interest with the Indians than any other people; that New Orleans must command the trade of our whole Western country; and, of course, that they will have a leading interest in its politics. It is a darling object with the First Consul, who sees in it a mean to gratify his friends, and to dispose of his armies. There is a man here, who calls himself a Frenchman, by the name of Francis Tatergem, who pretends to have great interest with the Creek nations. He has been advanced to the rank of a general of division. He persuades them that the Indians are extremely attached to France, and hate the Americans; that they can raise twenty thousand warriors; that the country is a paradise, &c. I believe him to be a mere adventurer; but he is listened to, and was first taken up by the old Directors.

I cannot help thinking that it would be advisable for the present Congress to take measures for establishing the Natchez, or some other port, and giving it such advantages as would bring our vessels to it, without touching at Orleans. On this subject, however, you will form a better judgment than I can. I have but one hope left as to defeating this cession. It consists in alarming Spain and England. The Spanish minister is now absent; but I have not failed to show, in the strongest light, to the minister of Britain the danger that will result to them from the extension of the French possessions into Mexico, and the probable loss of Canada, if they are suffered to possess it.

I have requested Mr. King to press this subject, also, as opportunity offers. I enclose a copy of my last letter to him. If the treaty does not close soon, I think it would be advisable for us to meet at Amiens, and have accordingly proposed it to him.

I believe, such is the state of things here, and such the desire for peace, that Britain may force them to relinquish Louisiana, particularly as the people here are far from desiring the establishment of any foreign colony which they consider as a weak point, and drain for the population and wealth.

[Enclosed in Mr. Livingston's despatch of March 24, 1802.]

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to Mr. King, minister at London.

PARIS, March 10, 1802.

If Louisiana goes into the hands of France, without any explanations on the part of her Government to us, (and this I have not yet been able to bring it to, though I have pointedly pressed it, both verbally and by note,) on the subject either of her boundary or the navigation of the Mississippi, it is impossible to see the extent of the power she will have in and over America. As part of the territory of Spain, Louisiana has no precise boundary; so that it is easy to foresee the fate of Mexico, especially when it is considered that General Bernadotte, who is marked for this expedition, has demanded, it is said, a large body of men. Britain will judge how far she is able to contend with France, enriched by the treasures of Spain. The boundary between Canada and Louisiana is alike unsettled. The dispositions of a great part of the natives of that country are friendly to France; her influence over the Indian tribes has always been, and will again be, much greater than that of the British, both from the disposition and manners of her people, and from the whole body of carriers in the Indian trade being native Canadians, and much the greater part of them mongrel French. It is impossible to say what their influence may be upon our Western country, in case of a controversy with Great Britain, particularly if they keep the keys of it by possessing the mouth of the Mississippi, or invite their aid in the plunder of Mexico. That the possession of that country, aided by the power of France in Europe, will draw after it that of all the islands, is easily foreseen. I mention these circumstances to you, though I know they could hardly escape you, as hints that you may use with advantage to introduce this business at Amiens. You well know how to give them additional weight. Nor is the right of Britain to interfere unfounded. By the sixth article of the treaty with us of 1778, they absolutely renounce all right to take, under any circumstances, any part of the country possessed then or before by Britain on that continent. Though we have relinquished all advantages deducible from that treaty, yet, so far as other nations were interested in it at the close of the last war, they have a right to enforce it. And surely it was a very important guaranty to Britain of her colonies; and it might, for aught we know, have had great influence upon the terms of the then peace.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pinckney, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 30, 1802.

We are anxious to hear from you on the several subjects with which you have been charged; particularly on that of Louisiana. By a treaty entered into between Spain and France, in March 1801, and lately published in the Paris newspapers, it appears that in an antecedent treaty the cession of that country had been stipulated by Spain. Still it is possible that the cession may have been since annulled; and that such was, or was to be the case, has been stated in verbal accounts from Madrid. At Paris, Mr. Livingston has been given to understand, by the French Government, that the cession had never been more than a subject of conversation between the two Governments. No information, however, has been received from him subsequent to the publication of the treaty of March, 1801, which must have led to some more decisive explanations.

The copies herewith enclosed of a memorial of sundry inhabitants living on waters running from the United States through Florida into the Gulf of Mexico, and of a letter from the late Mr. Hunter, representative in Congress of the Mississippi territory, will present to your attention a subject of some importance at this time, and of very great importance in a future view. The treaty with Spain having, as these documents observe, omitted to provide for the use of the Mobile, Chatahoochee, and other rivers running from our territory through that of Spain, by the citizens of the United States, in like manner with the use of the Mississippi, it will be proper to make early efforts to supply the defect. Should a cession, indeed, including the Spanish territory eastward of the Mississippi, have finally taken place, it can answer no purpose to seek from the Spanish Government this supplemental arrangement. On a contrary supposition, you will avail yourself of the most favorable moment and manner of calling its attention to the object. In support of our claim you will be able to use the arguments which enforced that to the navigation of the Mississippi. If it should be observed that a greater proportion of these rivers than of the Mississippi run through the exclusive territory of Spain, it may be a set-off that the upper parts of the rivers run, exclusively, through the territory of the United States, and do not merely divide it, like the Mississippi, from that of Spain. But neither the one nor the other circumstance can essentially affect our natural rights. Should the Spanish Government be favorably disposed, it will be proper for you to pave the way for a formal convention on the subject, endeavoring to obtain, in the mean time, such regulations from its authority, and such instructions to its officers, as will answer the purposes of our citizens. Among other hardships, of which they now complain, and for which a regulation is particularly wanted, one, I understand, is, that the article, cotton, which is acquiring rapid importance in that quarter, must, after it has been conveyed to Mobile, be shipped to New Orleans, and pay a duty of about twelve and a half per cent. before it can be exported.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, April 24, 1802.

The business most interesting to us, that of Louisiana, still remains in the state it was. The minister will give no answer to any inquiries I make on that subject. He will not say what their boundaries are, what are their intentions, and when they are to take possession. And what appears very extraordinary to me, is, that by a letter I have just received from Mr. Pinckney, I find that he still supposes that the Floridas are not included in the cession: and he writes me that he has made a proposition to purchase them, which lies before the minister with whom he is to have a conference on the subject. You may, however, be fully assured that the Floridas are given to France; that they are, at this moment, fitting out an armament from here to take possession. This will be commanded by General Bernadotte. The number of troops designed for this object is between five and seven thousand. They will shortly sail for New Orleans, unless the state of affairs in St. Domingo should change their destination. You may act upon this information with absolute certainty, since I have no doubts of the channel through which I have received it. It would be wise immediately to take measures to enable the Natchez to rival Orleans. I have suggested the means; and I hope they will not be neglected by the Congress now sitting. That you may judge of the light in which this country is viewed by some here, I send you the extract of a paper that now lies before the minister. If Congress make the Natchez a free port, and if the state of affairs in St. Domingo should employ the troops designed for Louisiana, time will still be left for gold to operate here. But it must be plentifully and liberally bestowed, not barely in the assumption of debts, but in active capital, afforded in supplies, to aid their armaments in the islands. Give me your instructions as to the utmost amount, if, as you will be better able to judge than I can, the affairs of St. Domingo are likely to be protracted.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, May 1, 1802.

The conduct of the French Government, in paying so little attention to its obligations under the treaty, in neglecting its debts to our citizens, in giving no answers to your complaints and expostulations, which you say is the case with those of other foreign ministers also, and particularly in its reserve as to Louisiana, which tacitly contradicts the language first held to you by the Minister of Foreign Relations, gives tokens as little auspicious to the true interests of France herself, as to the rights and the just objects of the United States.

The cession of Louisiana to France becomes daily more and more a source of painful apprehensions. Notwithstanding the treaty of March, 1801, and notwithstanding the general belief in France on the subject, and the accounts from St. Domingo that part of the armament sent to that island was eventually destined for Louisiana, a hope was still drawn, from your early conversations with M. Talleyrand, that the French Government did not mean to pursue the object. Since the receipt of your last communications, no hope remains but from the accumulating difficulties of going through with the undertaking, and from the conviction you may be able to impress, that it must have an instant and powerful effect in changing the relations between France and the United States. The change is obvious; and the more it can be developed in candid and friendly appeals to the reflections of the French Government, the more it will urge it to revise and abandon the project. A mere neighborhood could not be friendly to the harmony which both countries have so much an interest in cherishing; but if a possession of the mouth of the Mississippi is to be added to other causes of discord, the worst events are to be apprehended. You will, consequently, spare no efforts, that will consist with prudence and dignity, to lead the councils of France to proper views of this subject, and to an abandonment of her present purpose. You will also pursue, by prudent means, the inquiry into the extent of the cession, particularly whether it includes the Floridas as well as New Orleans, and endeavor to ascertain the price at which these, if included in the cession, would be yielded to the United States. I cannot, in the present state of things, be more particular on this head, than to observe, that in every view it would be a most precious acquisition, and that, as far as the terms could be satisfied by charging on the acquisition itself the restitutions and other debts to American citizens, great liberality would doubtless be indulged by this Government. The President wishes you to devote every attention to this object, and to be frequent and particular in your communications relating to it.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Rufus King, minister to England, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 1, 1802.

We are fully aware of the tendency of the reported cession of Louisiana to plant in our neighborhood troubles of different kinds, and to prepare the way for very serious events. It has accordingly been a primary object with the President to obviate such an event.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

SIR: LONDON, May 7, 1802.

Among the few great principles of national policy worthy of fixing the attention of our statesmen, I am willing to hope there is not one concerning which there is greater unanimity in opinion, than in that which enjoins upon us all to do our utmost, in every way, and upon all occasions, to maintain and perpetuate the union of our country.

With this persuasion, though the subject may not be thought to be included among the duties of my mission, I have not been able to remain inattentive or indifferent to the cession of Louisiana and the Floridas to France, because I have viewed it as a measure calculated and possibly intended to weaken and divide us. I have already communicated to you what passed between me and the ministers of this country in relation to this cession, during the negotiation for peace: but, as these communications were merely verbal, and as it appeared to me to be of some importance that they should be distinctly and formally confirmed, as well as that we should be ascertained of the sentiments of this Government in respect to this cession, I prepared and sent to Lord Hawkesbury a confidential letter upon the subject, a copy whereof, together with a copy of his answer, is annexed. I will only add that I have reason to be satisfied that the cession of Louisiana and the Floridas is considered by all the late ministry, as well as by all other men of influence in this country, as a measure of the greatest consequence, and which must have an unavoidable influence upon the duration of peace.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

[Enclosed in Mr. King's despatch of May 7, 1802.]

Mr. King to Lord Hawkesbury.

MY LORD: LONDON, April 21, 1802.

By the treaty of alliance concluded at Paris, in 1778, between the United States of America and France, the latter renounced forever the possession of every part of the continent of America, lying to the east of the course of the river Mississippi. This renunciation, confirming that which had been previously made in the treaty of 1763, between Great Britain and France, authorized the expectation that France, content with her widely-spread dominions, would abstain from seeking an extension of them in this part of the American continent; an expectation that appeared the more reasonable, inasmuch as the motives to such extension could not be satisfactorily reconciled with a just regard to the rights and security of those Powers between which this portion of America is divided, and by which the same is at present possessed.

Contrary, nevertheless, to expectations which have been entertained on this subject, if credit be due to uniform and uncontradicted reports, the Government of France has prevailed upon His Catholic Majesty to cede to France both the provinces of Louisiana and the Floridas, and, having thus acquired a station at the mouth, and on the sides of the Mississippi, may be inclined to interfere with and interrupt the open navigation of the same.

By the treaty of peace concluded at Paris, in 1783, between the United States of America and Great Britain, it is mutually stipulated, that "the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States." Without enlarging upon the great and peculiar importance of this navigation to the United States, a large and increasing portion of whose people can conveniently communicate with each other, and with foreign countries, by no other route, I take the liberty, through your lordship, to request that the British Government will, in confidence, explain itself upon this subject, and especially that it will explicitly declare whether any communication has been received by it from the Government of France or Spain respecting the said cession; or whether His Britannic Majesty has, in any manner, acquiesced in or sanctioned the same, so as to impair or affect the stipulation above referred to, concerning the free navigation of the Mississippi; in a word, I entreat your lordship to open yourself on this occasion with that freedom which, in matters of weighty concern, is due from one friendly nation to another, and which, in the present instance, will have the effect to do away all those misconceptions that may otherwise prevail in respect to the privity of Great Britain to the cession in question.

With the highest consideration, I have the honor to be,

RUFUS KING.

[Enclosed in Mr. King's despatch of May 7, 1802.]

Lord Hawkesbury to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, May 7, 1802.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st ultimo.

It is impossible that so important an event as the cession of Louisiana by Spain to France should be regarded by the King in any other light than as highly interesting to His Majesty, and to the United States; and should render it more necessary than ever that there should subsist between the two Governments that spirit of confidence which is become so essential to the security of their respective territories and possessions.

With regard to the free navigation of the Mississippi, I conceive that it is perfectly clear, according to the law of nations, that, in the event of the District of Louisiana being ceded to France, that country would come into the possession of it subject to all the engagements which appertained to it at the time of cession; and that the French Government could, consequently, allege no colorable pretext for excluding His Majesty's subjects, or the citizens of the United States, from the navigation of the river Mississippi.

With regard to the second question in your letter, I can have no difficulty in informing you that no communication whatever has been received by His Majesty from the Government of France or Spain relative to any convention or treaty for the cession of Louisiana or the Floridas; and I can, at the same time, most truly assure you that His Majesty has not, in any manner, directly or indirectly, acquiesced in or sanctioned this cession.

In making this communication to you, for the information of the Government of the United States, I think it right to acquaint you that His Majesty will be anxious to learn their sentiments on every part of this subject, and the line of policy which they will be inclined to adopt in the event of this arrangement being carried into effect.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

HAWKESBURY.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 11, 1802.

We are still without a line from you since your arrival at Madrid, and feel an increasing solicitude to hear from you on the subject of Louisiana. The latest information from Paris has confirmed the fact that it was ceded by a treaty prior to that of March, 1801; and, notwithstanding the virtual denial of the cession in the early conversations between Mr. Livingston and the Minister of Foreign Relations, a refusal of any explanations at present seems to admit that the cession has taken place. Still there are chances of obtaining a reversal of the transaction. The repugnance of the United States to it is, and will be, pressed in a manner that cannot be without some effect: it is known that most of the French statesmen best informed on the subject disapprove of it; the pecuniary difficulties of the French Government must, also, be felt as a check; whilst the prospect of a protracted and expensive war in St. Domingo must form a very powerful obstacle to the execution of the project. The councils of England appear to have been torpid on this occasion. Whether it proceeded from an unwillingness to risk a fresh altercation with France, or from a hope that such a neighborhood between France and the United States would lead to collisions which might be turned to her advantage, is more than I can decide. The latter consideration might justly have great weight with her; but as her eyes may be more readily turned to the immediate and certain purposes to be answered to her rival, it is to be presumed that the policy of England will contribute to thwart the acquisition. What the intentions of Spain may be, we wait to learn from you. Verbal information, from inofficial sources, has led us to infer that she disowns the instrument of cession, and will rigorously oppose it. Should the cession actually fail from this, or any other cause, and Spain retain New Orleans and the Floridas, I repeat to you the wish of the President, that every effort and address be employed to obtain the arrangement by which the territory on the east side of the Mississippi, including New Orleans, may be ceded to the United States, and the Mississippi made a common boundary, with a common use of its navigation for them and Spain. The inducements to be held out to Spain were intimated in your original instructions on this point. I am charged by the President now to add, that you may not only receive and transmit a proposition of guaranty of her territory beyond the Mississippi, as a condition of her ceding to the United States the territory, including New Orleans, on this side, but, in case it be necessary, may make the proposition yourself, in the forms required by our constitution. You will infer from this enlargement of your authority, how much importance is attached to the object in question, as securing a precious acquisition to the United States, as well as a natural and quiet boundary with Spain; and will derive from this consideration additional motives to discharge, with a prudent zeal, the task committed to you.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 20, 1802.

The same conduct was held [by the Minister of Exterior Relations] with respect to Louisiana. He would not acknowledge that the Government had yet formed any specific plan with respect to it, or that any troops were going out; but assured me, in general terms, that nothing should be done that should give us any just ground of complaint; on the contrary, their vicinity would promote our friendship.

I will not trouble you with the answers that obviously presented to this reasoning. It terminated, however, as all my conversations on this subject have done, in nothing.

I shall wait a few days in hopes of hearing from you, after having received a copy of my first note, when I shall act agreeably to your instructions, or, if you afford me none, send in a second, in which I shall press for a communication of the treaty with Spain, which, however, I am in hopes you may receive through Mr. Pinckney.

I believe that, for the present, the armament designed for Louisiana will be sent to Hispaniola, about which I find that much anxiety is entertained here.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, May 28, 1802.

SIR:

Since my last I have acquired information which I can depend on, relative to the intentions of this Government with respect to Louisiana. Bernadotte is, as I told you, to command: Collot, second in command. Adet is to be Prefect: but the expedition is delayed till about September, on account (as Talleyrand expressed himself to Bernadotte) of some difficulty which he did not explain; but which, I have no doubt, has arisen from the different apprehensions of France and Spain relative to the meaning of the term Louisiana, which has been understood by France to include the Floridas, but probably by Spain to have been confined to the strict meaning of the term. This explains why I could never get an answer to my questions relative to the extent of the cessions; and upon which the French Government had probably no doubt till we started it. Believing, if this conjecture as to the cause of the delay of the expedition was right, that no time should be lost in throwing obstructions in the way of its conclusion, I wrote the note, of which the enclosed is a copy, with the double purpose of alarming Spain, and furnishing with arguments, arising from the good faith they owed us, against giving their cession the construction France would wish. I consider this as the more important, because I believe that every negotiation for this object will be carried on here. I shall, however, give the earliest and fullest information I can on this subject to Mr. Pinckney, who will enforce at Madrid the arguments I may use here to excite the alarm of the court of Spain.

I wait impatiently some further instructions from you; those I have, in some sort prohibiting such measures as may show any dissatisfaction on the subject, of which, however, I doubt the policy. The subject is so interesting as to induce us to risk something to defeat it.

If I do not hear from you soon, I shall present a pointed memorial to this Government, stating fully and candidly our objections to their taking possession of the Floridas, and demanding security for the rights we had originally, and by treaty with Spain.

I am, sir, &c.

R. R. L.

[Enclosed in Mr. Livingston's despatch of 28th May, 1802.]

Mr. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, to his Excellency Chevalier d'Azara, Ambassador of His Catholic Majesty.

PARIS, May 28, 1802.

SIR:

The powerful interests that our respective Governments have, that the sincerest friendship and harmony should subsist between their territories in America, naturally leads to mutual confidence between their ministers, and a full exposition of their sentiments upon subjects which may have a tendency to interrupt that union. I think it my duty, therefore, to open myself to you with freedom on one which is very important as it regards the good faith which, I trust, both your Government and mine will consider as the first of obligations, and as it respects the great territorial interests of both Spain and the United States; and I flatter myself, sir, that with these objects in view, I shall meet with equal frankness and confidence on your part. It is generally understood that Spain has made a cession of Louisiana to France; and it might have been expected, considering the situation of this territory, and the friendly connexion between both countries and the United States, that a communication would have been made of this treaty to their Government. Passing over this circumstance, probably owing rather to inattention than to a want of confidence, I proceed to make some observations on the treaty now in force between the court of Madrid and the United States; and to inquire how far Spain has provided for the stipulations contained in that treaty, and secured thereby to the United States. The boundary between our respective Governments having been established, it is not to be doubted that the cession has confined itself to the same limits. But, sir, by the fourth article of that treaty, it is agreed that the mid-channel of the Mississippi, where it divides the territories of Spain from those of the United States, shall be the boundary, and that the navigation of this river shall be confined to the subjects of Spain and the citizens of the United States, unless it shall be extended to others by special convention. I am solicitous to know, sir, in what manner the rights of the citizens of the United States in this river are preserved by the terms of the cession. Where the river runs wholly within the territory of Spain, the United States have, by the treaty, a qualified right of navigation of which they cannot be divested. They have also the assurance of Spain that no other nation shall share this right unless by convention; by which I understand that Spain binds herself not to grant this right without some previous agreement on the subject with the United States: and this is rendered more evident from the words of the article not being confined to the river below the thirty-first degree of north latitude, but extending to the whole of the Mississippi, as well above as below: whereas, half the river above that boundary belonging to the United States, it could not have been intended that either of the contracting parties should have a right to grant, without the consent of the other, a right that was held in common. The word convention must, therefore, be intended to mean a convention between Spain and the United States; nor can any cession of the territory carry with it a right to admit other Powers to a participation of the advantages of the navigation of the Mississippi, unless by convention previously entered into between His Catholic Majesty and the United States. It is to be presumed that, in the cession which Spain has made, the Floridas are not included, because of the evident interest that she has in retaining them as a security for her territories in South America, if unfortunate events should hereafter produce a rupture between France and Spain. In this case, the Floridas, by lying in the rear of the French colonies, would serve as an effectual check as well to them as to those turbulent spirits in the adjoining States as might, in spite of the efforts of their Government, incline to associate in the enterprises of France. Upon this subject, sir, however, I pray to have more explicit information, because you will observe that, by the existing treaty between our respective nations, there are special stipulations mutually agreed upon, and which the United States have a right to expect some security for in any cession that Spain may make of that country. By the fifth article it is agreed that Spain will restrain by force all hostilities on the part of the Indian nations living within their boundary, either on the citizens of the United States, or the Indians within their territory, &c. You will easily see, sir, that as this is a national obligation, it may be doubtful whether it will pass with the territory, and yet is of such a nature as to entitle the United States to look for its performance from the good faith of Spain, who cannot, without the consent of the United States, place herself in a situation to render it of no effect. By the twenty-second article of the same treaty, Spain stipulates to permit the citizens of the United States to deposite their goods at New Orleans, and to export from thence free of duty, or, in case of withdrawing this permission, to assign them an establishment for this purpose on another part of the banks of the Mississippi. I take the liberty to ask, sir, (if the Floridas are included in the cession to France,) what stipulations the cession contains ensuring to the United States this important privilege which they considered themselves entitled to by the best of all guaranties, the good faith of His Catholic Majesty? You will easily see, sir, that if a naked cession has been made to France, without attention to these articles, how much reason the United States will have to complain of the measure: and I trust, sir, that you will see the propriety of their forming one of the parties to any treaty in which their rights may be so materially affected. I know, sir, that observations might, and I doubt not will be made officially to your court by the minister of the United States at Madrid: but, in the mean time, sir, as it is my intention to address myself upon this subject to the Government of France, I wish to receive from you every information which might throw light upon the subject, and the rather as knowing the confidence that His Catholic Majesty reposed in your talents and patriotism; and seeing, at the same time, that in every thing that related to this object our respective nations had a joint interest. I have believed that you will receive with pleasure this unofficial note as a mark of my confidence, and afford me your aid in giving efficacy to a treaty which has served as the basis of friendship between our respective nations.

R. R. L.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, June 8, 1802.

Enclosed is the answer of the Spanish ambassador to my letter, a copy of which was forwarded on the 28th ult. It accords with the conclusions I drew from the delay of the expedition, and the conduct of the Minister for Exterior Relations. I have had a conversation with Collot and Adet, separately. I find, that though they both consider their going in official characters to Louisiana as settled, yet that they have neither seen the treaty, nor know precisely the boundary of the territory acquired. Pensacola and Mobile, they say, are expressly given: as to the rest, or whether it includes West Florida, they cannot say. That France intended that it should, I have no doubt; and I still think it probable that she will make it yield to her intentions: for in Europe she does what she will, and it will require firmness and exertion to prevent her doing so in America.

[Enclosed in Mr. Livingston's despatch of June 8, 1802.]

Le Chevalier d'Azara, Ambassadeur de S. M. Catholique près la république Française, à Monsieur Livingston, Ministre Plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis.

PARIS, le 2 Juin, 1802.

MONSIEUR:

Je vous demande bien pardon de n'avoir pas pu vous recevoir quand vous avez eu la bonté de venir chez moi; l'état de mon santé, que n'est pas bien depuis dix jours, m'a privé de cet honneur là.

Je vous rend bien de graces pour la franchise avec laquelle vous me parlez dans vôtre lettre non-officielle du 28 Mai; et, en adoptant la même amitié et la même franchise, j'ai l'honneur de vous dire, que l'affaire dont vous me parlez n'ayant pas passé par mes mains, je ne me trouve pas en état de vous en donner tous les renseignemens que vous souhaitez. Nonobstant, je crois certain le traité de la cession de la Louisianne; mais il me parait que les Florides n'y ont pas été compris.

Comme le ministre des Etats Unis à Madrid sera chargé (selon ce que vous avez la bonté de me dire) de demander à ma cour des explications sur le traité en question, vôtre Gouvernement recevra, par son moyen, tous les éclaircissemens convenables. Néanmoins, j'écrirai à ma cour, et je ne manquerai pas de vous communiquer tout ce que j'en apprendrai, pour calmer, en mon particulier, toutes vos doutes et vos inquiétudes.

J. NICOLAY D'AZARA.

[TRANSLATION.]

The Chevalier d'Azara, Ambassador of His Catholic Majesty near the French republic, to Mr. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

PARIS, June 2, 1802.

SIR:

I pray you to excuse my not having been able to see you when you were so good as to call at my dwelling; the ill state of my health for the last ten days has deprived me of that honor.

I return you thanks for the frankness disclosed in your unofficial note of the 28th May; and, in adopting the same friendship and equal frankness, I have the honor to inform you that the affair concerning which you have addressed me not having passed through my hands, I am unable to give you all the information which you have desired. It appears certain, however, that a treaty ceding Louisiana has been concluded; but I am of opinion that the Floridas are not comprised in the cession.

As the minister of the United States at Madrid will be required (agreeably to what you have had the goodness to inform me) to demand explanation of my court concerning the treaty in question, your Government will receive, through him, all the information which may be proper. Nevertheless, I will write to my court, and will not fail to communicate all that I may learn, for the purpose, as far as depends on me, of removing your doubts and dispelling your inquietude.

J. NICOLAY D'AZARA.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 23, 1802.

The subject of your letter of May 7th, namely, your correspondence with Lord Hawkesbury on the cession of Louisiana and the Floridas to France, will receive from the President all the consideration which its great importance demands; and as soon as an answer can be founded on the result of his reflections, no time will be lost in transmitting it.

Extract:—James Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 26, 1802.

The last information from Paris renders it certain that the cession of Louisiana to France has actually been concluded, and that the cession comprehends the two Floridas. In this state of the business, it seems unnecessary to decide on the price which Spain might be led to expect for a cession of the Floridas, including New Orleans, to the United States; and the more so, as it would be of use for us previously to know the value she places on the guaranty proposed in my letter to you of 25th of September last. For the present, the cession wished by the United States must be an object of negotiation with the French Government. It will, notwithstanding, continue to be proper for you to cultivate the good dispositions of Spain in relation to it, both as they may not be entirely disregarded by France, and as, in the turn of events, Spain may possibly be extricated from her engagements to France, and again have the disposal of the territories in question.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, July 30, 1802.

I have received your despatches and the President's by M. Dupont de Nemours. I shall reply, more particularly to them at the next opportunity, as I am now very much engaged in preparing a lengthy memoir on the subject of the mutual interest of France and the United States, relative to Louisiana, by which I hope to convince them that, both in a commercial and political view, the possession of it would be disadvantageous to France. In my last, I hinted to you my suspicions that France and Spain did not understand each other on the subject of Louisiana, and communicated to you my letters to the Spanish ambassador, calculated to sound this business, and interpose some difficulties to its execution. His answer confirmed my opinion. I have since received, verbally, his explicit assurance that the Floridas are not included in the cession; and I have been applied to, by one of the ministers here, to know what we understand, in America, by Louisiana. You can easily conceive my answer. I have just received a letter from Mr. Graham, in which he communicates the Spanish minister's answer to Mr. Pinckney's application upon the same subject, in these words: "If the King should think proper to cede Louisiana, he will take care that the interest of the United States shall not be affected by it." It appears, also, by the fifth article of the treaty of Madrid, March 21st, 1801, that the cession had been made of Louisiana generally. The French, you know, have always extended it to South Carolina and all the country on the Ohio. Since the possession of the Floridas by Britain, and the treaty of 1763, I think there can be no doubt as to the precise meaning of the terms.

I find a certain degree of raideur in the Spanish ambassador, on that subject, which it will be our interest to cherish at the court of Spain, unless we should have a prospect of purchasing the Floridas. In the present state of things, until the point is settled, I think it probable the expedition to Louisiana will be postponed. In the mean time, all that can be done here will be to endeavor to obtain a cession of New Orleans, either by purchase, or by offering to make it a port of entry to France, on such terms as shall promise advantages to her commerce, and give her hopes of introducing her manufactures and wines into our Western country. An arrangement of this sort, if they listen to it, would certainly be beneficial to both countries, and only hurtful to Britain. If to this we could add a stipulation that she shall never possess the Floridas, but, on the contrary, in case of a rupture with Spain, and a conquest of them, cede them to us, our affairs in that quarter would stand as well as I would wish; and the colonies that France might attempt to establish on the west side of the Mississippi would be too feeble to injure us. I find them very anxious to have the ports of Pensacola and St. Augustine, as they dread our having the command of the Gulf. I confess this appears to me no very important object; and if they would be content with these, and give us West Florida and New Orleans, even at a large price, we should not hesitate. I am sorry that you have not communicated to me what are precisely the utmost limits of the sum I may venture to offer in cash, or in our own demands. As the minister has been absent some time, and has but just returned, I cannot state precisely to you what we may hope on this subject; but be persuaded that I am fully impressed with the importance of the subject, and that nothing will be left undone which I can do to effectuate your wishes. I saw him last night, and was very cordially received. His health is so much mended by the waters, that I hope he will be able to go through business more speedily than he has done.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 10, 1802.

Our own affairs have advanced but little, since the whole attention of those in power are turned to objects nearer home. I have had several conferences on the subject of Louisiana, but can get nothing more from them than I have already communicated. I have thought it best, by conversation and by writing, to pave the way, prior to any direct application, till I know better to what object to point. For this purpose, I have written the enclosed essay, which I have had translated, and struck off twenty copies; I have just got them finished; I have placed some of them in such hands as I think will best serve our purposes. Talleyrand has promised me to give it an attentive perusal; after which, when I find how it works, I will come forward with some proposition. I am very much, however, at a loss, as to what terms you would consider it as allowable to offer, if they can be brought to a sale of the Floridas, either with or without New Orleans: which last place will be of little consequence, if we possess the Floridas, because a much better passage may be formed on the east side of the river. I may, perhaps, carry my estimate of them too high; but when I consider, first, the expense it will save us in guards and garrisons, the risk of war, the value of duties, and what may be raised by the sale of lands, I should think them a cheap purchase. I trust, however, that you will give me some directions on this head, and not leave the responsibility of offering too much or too little entirely at my door. I speak in all this business as if the affair of the Floridas was arranged with Spain; which I believe is not yet the case. But I took occasion to touch on the subject three days ago with the Spanish ambassador, with whom I was dining, and think he appeared to have somewhat relaxed on that ground, but would say nothing decisive; nor were the time and place proper to press him.

[Memoir, referred to in the preceding despatch.]

Whether it will be advantageous to France to take possession of Louisiana?
This question presents itself in two points of view:
First, as it affects the commerce and manufactures of France.
Second, as it affects her positive or relative strength.

Colonies are never cherished for themselves, but on account of the influence they may have upon the general prosperity of the nation. And as one man, at home, contributes more to this than two at a distance, no wise nation colonizes but when it has a superfluous population, or when it has a superfluous capital that cannot otherwise be rendered productive.

The population of France, though very considerable, has by no means attained the point which renders it necessary to colonize. The soil, climate, and local situation give it advantages as a commercial and more particularly as a manufacturing nation, over every other part of Europe. The ingenuity, taste, and industry of the inhabitants have placed them in the highest rank; but these advantages are very much restricted by the want of a sufficient capital to bring them into operation. A rival nation, inferior in all the circumstances I have mentioned, by the single effect of a large capital, has attained a superiority both in commerce and manufactures which, in return, those circumstances enable it to maintain by continually adding to that national wealth. Capital increases manufactures by the introduction of machines, by the regular payment of workmen, by reducing the interest of money, and, above all, by forcing new markets. The wealthy mechanic alone can afford those expensive and slow operations which, in many cases, give perfection to a fabric. And the rich merchant, alone, can afford to make long voyages, from which he has slow returns; or give such extensive credits as will tempt those of foreign countries to purchase his commodities in preference to such as are offered by nations who expect more speedy payments. Such is the want of capital in France, that no manufacturer has any quantity of goods on hand to answer an immediate demand; and, of course, no foreign merchant can rely upon the certainty of obtaining such an assortment of goods from the French consignee of his cargo, as will answer his purpose, without either detaining his vessel, or being compelled to take a considerable proportion in articles of very inferior value, picked up from different manufactories; so that if frauds are committed, no one can be charged with them; a circumstance that renders character of little importance to the French mechanic.

To this cause is owing that when a foreign ship, particularly one from a distant nation, disposes of her cargo in France, she has orders to take wines and brandies in return, because these are the only articles that the owner can depend upon having, in time, of the quantity he orders. On the contrary, any species of goods is obtained in England at an hour's warning from a single manufacturer, whose character is at stake if they should not prove equal to the sample. This circumstance will always induce a foreign merchant to prefer dealing for goods of the same nature with a British, rather than with a French factor: and accordingly we find cargoes sold in France, and the money remitted to England to purchase articles that France might furnish, were her manufacturers sufficiently rich to supply them, at a short notice, without compelling the buyer to seek them at different deposits. This evil can only be remedied by an increase of capital in the hands of manufacturers. To show how this capital might be obtained, would lead me too far out of my present subject. But it must be obviously diminished either where a navy is raised at the expense of the manufacturer, or where the capital of the nation is employed in distant countries. The operation of capital in opening new markets is obvious; for nothing is more evident than that merchants of foreign countries, not possessing large capitals, are content to be the agents of those who can furnish them goods upon credit. And it is by this means that Britain has found no loss of market in America, in consequence of their having become independent; their immense capital having created a moneyed dependence which has supplied, in a commercial point of view, that which they before derived from the supremacy of her Government. The increase of American capital is now freeing her, in some sort, from that dependence, and enabling her to extend her commercial operations, and even to afford a capital to other nations, who shall know how to estimate the value of the market she affords to the manufactures and luxuries of Europe. It will readily be admitted that transmarine colonies add nothing to the strength of a nation. They are, on the contrary, weak points, that are guarded at great expense of men and money; more particularly where they are placed in warm and unhealthy climates. The simple question, then, is—Has France such a superfluity of capital or people as will justify the establishment of new colonies?

Those that France already possesses in the West Indies and at Cayenne are more than sufficient to supply all the demands of France, and indeed, the demands of all Europe, were they fully cultivated, for those commodities that constitute their staples. But how are they to be cultivated? Experience has proved that the inhabitants of warm climates are never led by their necessities to labor. Force alone can supply those taskmasters (cold and hunger) which nature has placed under northern skies. Hence the necessity of slaves in rendering the West Indies productive. These are only to be procured at a very considerable expense. The Spanish port of St. Domingo was almost uncultivated for want of slaves. It is now in the hands of France; and to render it productive, an immense capital in slaves, in buildings, and in improvements of uncultivated lands, will be necessary. Great capital will also be required to supply the losses that the French part of the island has sustained, to say nothing of the other islands. From whence is this capital to be drawn? Persons that settle in remote and unhealthy climates seldom possess much. It must, then, be drawn either from France, or from some other country that possesses superfluous capital. If drawn from France, it must, to a certain degree, injure the manufactures of France at home. It may, however, where the territory is so extremely productive as the French islands are, where the lands are already in a state of cultivation, and the capital advanced will produce an immediate interest, be found advantageous, in a national point of view, to encourage the application of French capital to this object. But while the interest of money is high in France, while the interior of the republic affords a variety of profitable speculations to the capitalist, and while few persons are found possessed of superfluous wealth, it will be difficult to induce many to vest their capital in a distant country, subject to risk from the dishonesty of their agents, and those others which recent transactions will teach them to dread. Foreign capital was once drawn from the United Provinces. The state, however, of the Batavian colonies, and the losses sustained by the war, preclude all hope that much of this will now be applied to ameliorate the French islands. The United States possess an extensive capital in money, and in products necessary for the re-establishment of the islands. Money will not be lent, in large quantities, upon the credit of the planters; but, with proper encouragement, there is little doubt that products for which money must otherwise be paid, might be obtained. And the mercantile speculations of the United States will embrace the French islands, when the private and public credit of France shall be re-established, and experience shall have taught her the futility of attempting to raise a revenue upon foreign commerce, while in fact she is throwing it upon her own citizens.

In St. Domingo twenty per cent. is paid on articles introduced by foreigners. This is, indeed, collected from the foreigners; and, owing to the mismanagement and frauds which generally prevail in custom-houses at a distance, is a source of very considerable vexation to the trader. But the money is paid by the planter: for it is always added to the price, and even an interest or profit charged upon the duty itself, and a compensation for all the vexations the merchant suffers. What, then, is the effect of this operation but to deduct, at least, one quarter from the money which the planter has, with difficulty, drawn from France or elsewhere, and so far to impede the re-establishment of the capital that can alone render the island ultimately productive to France? I say ultimately, for it will be idle to expect that they should compensate the actual expenses of the French Government till years have elapsed. Nay, I will venture to say, that, unless the ports of St. Domingo are thrown open to all vessels bringing necessaries, unless the inhabitants are permitted to buy cheap and to sell dear, by encouraging a competition among buyers and sellers, unless every species of vexation is removed, and every possible assurance given that foreign capitals entrusted to the islands will be perfectly safe, ages will elapse before St. Domingo will cease to drain the wealth and strength of France without offering an equivalent return. It is obvious, then, that if France possessed no other transmarine property than her islands in the West Indies, she would find room to place all the capital she can now, or probably will be able to spare in a long course of years. But if, in connexion with this, we look to her immense territory in the Brazils, to its productions, and the capital it will require to give it the value it is susceptible of; if we add to this the establishments it may be necessary to make in the East Indies, in order to enable the French ports to possess all that variety of commodities which invite exchanges and give activity to commerce; we shall find a century, at least, will elapse before France needs such new establishments. But as she, like every other country, possesses a limited capital, the sole object of inquiry should be, where can this capital be best placed? At home? In the islands? At Cayenne? In the East Indies? Or in Louisiana? For it is obvious, that whatever is placed in one is taken from the other. It is equally obvious that the national expense must be increased by the increase of its establishments, and the points of attack and defence be multiplied in the same proportion in case of war.

Many able statesmen have doubted whether, to a country situated as France, any colonies were of use; but it is not my design to enter into those theories. France possesses colonies. She has urged her citizens to remove themselves, and invest property in them, and she is bound in good faith to retain and protect them. But she is not bound to create new colonies, to multiply her points of defence, and to waste a capital which she needs both at home and abroad. In what view would the possession of Louisiana be useful to France? First, like every other warm climate, it must be cultivated by slaves. The capital employed in purchasing these slaves, or the slaves themselves, would be carried to the islands, if a new market was not open for them. The competition will enhance the price to the planters in the islands, and so far obstruct their speedy re-establishment. When the slaves arrive in Louisiana, they must be employed in the unproductive labor of clearing the immense forests with which that country is covered; a labor ill calculated for slaves, since it requires long habit in the use of the axe, and a strength and activity seldom found in slaves. At all events, they must be maintained, clothed, and fed, for years, before any profit will result from their labor: how long, may be determined, in some sort, from this fact. When new lands are put out to lease in the Northern and Middle States of America, the usual terms are ten years free of rent, and, after that, twelve bushels of wheat per hundred acres forever. It is obvious, then, that the first ten years are considered as years of expense, during which the landlord asks nothing; but, in the Southern States, land cannot even be put out on these terms, because there the white inhabitants place a higher value upon their labor, and the clearing lands by slaves involves too great an expense for any man who is not absolute owner of the soil. Who, then, will cultivate Louisiana with slaves? Who, among the French citizens, will vest a large capital in so precarious a property, with the hope of a distant return? There are, also, circumstances in the situation of Louisiana, which render it more difficult. Louisiana is bounded by an immense wilderness. Slaves, employed in the clearing of forests, will form acquaintances with the natives; and they will, upon every occasion, escape from labor to the indolence of a savage life. It may be asked, why does this not happen in the Southern States of America? First, because none are so far South as to be free from the rigors of winter, which make it difficult for the inhabitants of a warm climate to endure a savage life; and, next, because the Southern States are, in a great measure, surrounded by the sea, and by the mountains which only know a white population, and intercept the communication of the slaves with the waste forests in their rear. But, supposing all these difficulties surmounted, what advantage would result to France, in a commercial point of view, from the establishment of this colony? So far as its productions are similar to those of their islands, nothing would be gained, because the islands, well cultivated, are equal to every demand of France, and, indeed, of Europe. The introduction of those from Louisiana would only reduce the price, without adding to the value; and France would find herself compelled, in order to prevent the ruin of those who had vested their capital in the colonies, to imitate the Dutch, who destroy their spices and teas when they find that the quantity debases the value. Commodities, not raised in the islands, and which might be found in Louisiana, are only wood, and, perhaps, rice; but it is certain that these productions, when attended with the expense of procuring them in a warm and unhealthy climate, will not compensate the expense, or, at least, furnish the same profit to labor that might be obtained, were it employed, as in the islands, in raising more valuable commodities; a proof of which will be found in the United States. It is not from Georgia or South Carolina that the West India islands are supplied with wood, but principally from the Northern States, though wood-lands are much scarcer and more valuable with them than to the Southward. The reason is, that the furnishing lumber, the preparing it for the market, the mills necessary for that purpose, all require the labor of free hands content to work for a small profit.

Though it may seem paradoxical, I will venture to say that it is not the interest of France to supply herself with wood, even if she could do it from Louisiana: and that, for two reasons. The lumber supplied to her islands by the Northern States is paid for in molasses, and a small quantity of taffia. The first costs nothing to the planter, being an otherwise useless product of his sugar; and the second a trifling expense in the distillation. If these were not consumed in America, the molasses would absolutely be thrown away, (as it was when the United States were British colonies,) because the commerce of France offers no other market for it. The islands then may be truly said to have their lumber from the United States for nothing. If, on the contrary, an establishment was made in Louisiana for the purpose of furnishing lumber, all the expense of such an establishment to the nation, together with all the labor employed in cutting the wood, preparing and sending it to market, would be actual loss to the nation, even supposing the wood-cutter content to be paid in molasses and rum, because his labor produces nothing to the nation. But it is certain that Louisiana would afford no market for either molasses or rum. The consumption of those are found only in the Northern States of America: the Southern prefer spirits made from grain, apples, and peaches, to that distilled from molasses. The planters, then, supposing their supply of lumber to be exclusively furnished by a French colony in Louisiana, would be compelled to pay for it in money, or in some article of real value. If it was not exclusively furnished, it would not be furnished at all; because the wood-cutter in a southern climate could never work so cheap as to compete with the hardy sons of the North. It may be thought that the molasses would find a market in the Northern States, even if not given in return for lumber: but this is not the fact. The only inducement with them to take it, is, that they get it in return for a commodity for which they have little other market. Let the islands refuse to take the wood of the Northern States, and they will instantly substitute spirits distilled from grains and apples to that drawn from molasses: (because, in this case, the price of rum must necessarily rise,) and all commerce between the islands will stop, except for articles of provision, in return for which they will only take money, or what will produce money at a foreign market. The second reason why France should not, were it even in her power, seek her supply of lumber from a colony in Louisiana, is, that, in case of a war, supposing Britain to maintain her naval superiority, those supplies would be rendered extremely precarious. Nor would the want of them be easily supplied from the United States; for having, during peace, given up that branch of commerce, (and the persons employed in it having turned their attention to other objects, and the mills created for sawing the lumber having gone to decay,) it would not be easily re-established on the breaking out of a war; the calamities of which would by this means fall doubly hard upon the islands. In a commercial point of view, then, it is obvious that the colonization of Louisiana would be injurious to France; because it would divert a capital that might be more usefully employed in her other colonies; because that capital would be unproductive for many years; and because, when it became productive to the individual, it would add nothing to the mass of national wealth, but merely lower the price of commodities supplied by the West Indies, and lessen the profit of labor. It may, however, be supposed that the possession of Louisiana would afford an additional market to French manufactures, and so far compensate the nation for the expense of the establishment. This question is worthy of examination; and the supply or consumption of French fabrics must have a reference either to the free population, or to that of the slaves. If the free population is to be supplied by emigration from France, it will consist of that class of people who could not only maintain themselves in France, but add something to its wealth by their labor; for France is not overstocked with inhabitants; and, of course, none can emigrate without leaving a void somewhere, or some useful labor unperformed. The actual emigrant, then, takes something from the general stock of productive labor in the parent state. He also carries with him a part of the capital, (for he cannot go empty-handed,) and he must remain, as I have stated, ten years before he renders his new establishment more than sufficient to support himself. In the mean time, he must live with the utmost economy; for having nothing to give in exchange, he can furnish little from the parent country; and, indeed, the nature of a southern climate exacts very few of those articles which are necessaries in Europe. There can be no question, then, that, so far as relates to the actual emigrant, the few articles he will require from French looms will not compensate the nation for his loss of labor: nay, that he will consume so much less in America than he would have done in France, that, beside his labor, the manufacturer that supplied him in both countries will be an actual loser by his removal. Black population will contribute still less to aid the manufactures of France, because their consumption is extremely small in the article of clothing. Even in South Carolina it does not amount to more than forty francs a year for each black. In Louisiana, as the winter is less severe, it will be proportionably less. It will consist of cotton, much of it made at home, and much more obtained from the United States by an illicit commerce. But even if the whole was brought from France, after deducting the value of the raw material which France must purchase, the whole profit to the French manufacturer and merchant would not exceed thirty livres a head, for each slave. Now, every slave sent to Louisiana will cost the nation one thousand francs; and as this capital should produce in France at least ten per cent. employed in any species of commerce or manufacture, the whole difference between one hundred francs, the product in France, and thirty francs, drawn from the advantage of clothing him, will be actual loss to France, for the first ten years at least, in which they can, (as I have before proved,) at the utmost, do no more than support themselves: as numbers will die in the seasoning, and many will elope, the actual loss to France upon every slave imported and employed in Louisiana will be one hundred and sixty francs per annum. But if the profit resulting from the labor of the same slave, who might have been carried to the islands instead of to Louisiana, is added to the account, (and it is certain that all carried to Louisiana is taken from the islands,) it will be found that the actual loss to the nation, in the mis-employment of his labor, will amount to upwards of six hundred francs a year, so that the first loss to the nation, on the introduction of one thousand slaves into Louisiana, beyond the first cost of the slaves, will be six hundred thousand francs. It is true, that if peace continues, and the colony, contrary to every reasonable expectation, should flourish, the wealthy planters will consume more French fabrics, but the consumption of the slaves will always be trifling, and their labor absolutely unprofitable; because, as I have before observed, being employed in raising articles that can be better raised in quantities equal to the demand in the islands, and for which the market is limited, they will only, by adding to the quantity, lower the price of those commodities which it is the interest of France, who possesses such productive islands, to keep up. I know an idea prevails that the commodities of France can, by means of the Mississippi, find their way into the western parts of the United States. Nothing could give birth to this idea but the most perfect ignorance of the navigation of that river, and of the wants of the inhabitants. It is certain that the wines of France are ill calculated for so warm a climate as they must pass through to arrive in the Western States, and worse suited to the palates or purses of the inhabitants, both of which are better adapted to their own liquors, cider, beer, whiskey, and peach brandy; the last of which, with age, is superior to the best brandy of France. Instead, then, of receiving these articles from France, through Louisiana, they will more probably supply the colony with them. Glass, or earthenware, as they have all the materials on hand, they make for themselves, in all the back countries of America. The consumption of china is exceedingly small, and, were it greater, the French china is too dear to enter into competition with that of the East Indies. Bulky articles in iron are also made among themselves; and the hardware of England has such an acknowledged superiority over that of France, that none of the latter could be vended, were the market open to both. The only articles, then, that could be possibly introduced, would be silks, cambrics, and other light articles of luxury. These, however, will never pass by the way of the Mississippi. The dangerous navigation of the Gulf, the slow and expensive passage up the river against the current, the large capital of the American and British merchants at Philadelphia, and the great improvements that are daily making in the inland canals and roads, will always carry these by land to the Ohio and other rivers, from which they can be transported to every other settlement on cheap and easy terms. It is a well known fact that dry goods have been carried from Philadelphia to New Orleans by this route, in preference to going thither directly by water. It is chimerical, therefore, to expect to vend the commodities of France, through that channel, when even England, with all her enterprise, her right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the prejudice of Americans in favor of her fabrics, has never ventured to send her commodities by that channel, well knowing that through Baltimore and Philadelphia they will find an easier entrance. But should France wish to introduce more bulky articles by this channel, and habituate the inhabitants of the Western States to her wines and to her fabrics, it can only be done by putting New Orleans into their hands, stipulating, at the same time, that it shall ever remain a free port of entry to French ships and French fabrics, subject to no greater duties than those paid by American ships. This will, at once, interest the American merchants settled in New Orleans, in their commerce, turn their capital from England to France, and give the latter all the advantages of the island, without the expense of maintaining it; and the money acquired by the activity of America from the Spanish Government would centre in France, because England, not having the same facilities, and paying higher duties, could not supply them upon the same terms. Should France, on the other hand, determine to keep the island, a great part of the commercial capital now in Orleans (which is principally American and British) will, in that case, be moved to such other place as the United States shall fix upon, and this being naturally placed in a state of rivalry to New Orleans, and freed from the vexations that never fail to attend a military Government at a distance from the eye of the sovereign, will, notwithstanding any disadvantage in point of situation, draw after it the commerce that now centres there. The limits settled between Spain and the United States, and lately between the latter and Britain, preclude the inhabitants of Louisiana from any share of the fur-trade, which, indeed, never could have been considerable, as the Southern furs are of little value; the few deer skins they receive are an object of no moment in a commercial view, as will be found from a view of the exports of New Orleans, even now that the United States Mississippi territory transport through that channel.

In these reflections I have not taken into account the hardships, expenses, and loss of lives, that result from the establishment of new colonies in a marshy country and warm climate, the inroads of savages, the insurrection of slaves, the insubordination of troops, and the abuses of officers when far removed from the superintending eye of the sovereign; any or all of which may defeat the object, and ruin the establishment. There is, however, one consideration, and that a very important one, that ought to have some weight. Many who carry their families and their capital into Louisiana, finding that land is equally cheap on the American side of the line, will, sometimes from a preference to their form of Government, sometimes from caprice, sometimes from pique, or to get rid of the oppression of a military government, (for such that of Louisiana must necessarily be,) remove to the territory of the United States, even in time of peace. In case of a war between France and Spain, this desire will be general; because, supposing Britain to maintain her naval superiority, (which I have upon a former occasion shown that she will, unless the commercial system of France shall be much more liberal than it now is,) the mouth of the Mississippi will be blocked up, and the planters of the French colony be reduced to the utmost distress, while those of the United States will acquire advantages from the war. In this case, a great proportion of the capital that France shall place in Louisiana will be transferred to the United States, where farms ready cleared may be purchased at half the price at which a French planter can clear his, owing to the dexterity of American woodsmen, who have been educated to the use of the axe, and acquired that strength in the muscles of the arm, which is unattainable by men who have been brought up to other employments. Past experience has evinced the truth of these observations. Louisiana, though settled near a century, has flourished neither in the hands of Spain nor of France; and, at this moment, at least half the trade of Orleans is carried on upon the capital of citizens of the United States, under the faith of their treaty with Spain. When France shall establish a rival colony there, this will be removed to such other place on the Mississippi as it shall be the policy of the United States to encourage.

If, in a commercial view, the settlement of Louisiana shall not be advantageous to France, but, on the contrary, really injurious, by diverting her capital from more important objects; in a political one, it will be found still more inconsistent with her interests. To France, considered either as a maritime or a commercial nation, the United States are of the last importance. On the first subject, I have, upon a former occasion, expressed my sentiments fully. On the latter, there can be no doubt that an agricultural nation, whose industry enables them to purchase with the product of their raw materials the luxuries and fabrics of Europe, and whose habits and pursuits prevent them from manufacturing for themselves, must offer an important market to the inhabitants of the Old World. In this view the trade of the United States is considered as extremely valuable to Britain. But France, when her manufactures shall attain the perfection of which they are susceptible, and her trade be placed upon the proper foundation, presents a much greater variety of subjects for the support of this commerce than Britain. From the last, America receives only the product of her looms and her forges. From the first, she will not only take these, but aid her agriculture by the purchase of her wines, her oils, and her brandies; while, on the other hand, France affords a better market than Britain to many of the products of the United States. These circumstances, and the relative positions of France, which precludes all idea of danger or rivalship, either by sea or by land, between her and the United States, has made them view her as a natural ally, and consider the measure of her power as an additional pledge for the safety of their commerce and their future tranquillity. They have done homage to the wisdom of those statesmen who, at the end of a successful war, conceived it more advantageous to France to ensure the lasting friendship of the United States, than to acquire a territory which might excite their jealousy, and throw them back into the hands of the nation from whom they had but just aided to liberate them.

I am aware of the delicacy of touching upon the political evils that may result to France and to the United States from the former possessing itself of New Orleans and the Floridas, lest, on the one hand, I should leave unsaid what truth requires to be spoken, and, on the other, give umbrage by a freedom which haughty spirits may construe into menace. Feeling myself, however, a citizen of one of these States, and warmly attached to the other, I trust that those into whose hands this shall be placed, will duly appreciate my motives in endeavoring to remove all ground of controversy between nations formed to aid each other: and, while they believe me sufficiently acquainted with the resources of my own country, not to dread the power of any European nation, they will think me equally incapable of so ridiculous an idea as that of menacing a Government before whose power united Europe has bowed. I have observed that France and the United States are so happily placed with respect to each other, as to have no point of collision. They can mutually aid, without having the smallest temptation to injure, each other. And, as there is no nation at present on the globe whose consumption offers such encouragement to foreign manufactures as that of the United States; as this consumption is rapidly increasing; as they have the means of establishing a navy whenever their situation shall render it necessary, how strong, how powerful, should the inducement be that compels France to lose these advantages, and convert a natural and warm ally into a jealous and suspicious neighbor, and perhaps, in the progress of events, into an open enemy!

Experience has evinced that no two nations can border upon each other, without having the spirit of rivalry excited: and if this is true with respect to neighboring nations, it will be found to apply more forcibly to the colony of a great and powerful nation placed at a distance from home, and a sovereign adjoining such nation. The reason is obvious. Where two nations join each other, every thing passes under the eye of the sovereign; and differences may be accommodated as soon as they arise; but when the Governor of a colony, relying for protection from home, is guilty of an act of hostility, the wound festers before the physician can be called in. The offended sovereign, too, will presume that the officer will meet with support, the greater as his nation is more powerful; will endeavor to anticipate the hostilities it dreads; it will recriminate; and the nations will be plunged into a war before explanations can take place. If there is a situation in the world that would lead to these melancholy consequences, it would be that of France in possession of New Orleans. It blocks up the great outlet to a great number of the American States, and to a very extensive and growing population. On this island a military Government will be established. The commander and his troops, justly elated with the glory of their nation, will look down upon surrounding people. Commerce will be despised, and those who practise it be subjected to the despotism of men who will seek a compensation for their privations in being sent to a distant country and unhealthy climate, in the acquisition of wealth. The colony itself affords no legitimate sources for this, but those which arise gradually from commerce and agriculture, equally ill-suited to the military character. No vigilance on the part of the parent country can control the oppressions, that will be practised by men at such a distance; nor will the ardent spirits of the new settlers in States that border on the Mississippi, in many cases be sufficiently controlled, (even by their own Government,) to prevent their endeavors to avenge themselves, rather than to wait the tardy justice that they may hope for from diplomatic representations. The resentments of the people will be sharpened against each other; the ties of friendship will be broken, and the Government of the United States, which always partakes of the feelings of the people, will find itself unavoidably placed in such a situation as to change its connexion, and to guard against the supposed hostility of its old ally, by forming cautionary connexions with Britain, who will court their alliance and stimulate their resentments against France; because by this connexion she will hope to retain the commerce of America, which she almost exclusively possesses, give security to her colonies, and, in case of a war, facilitate her attempts to conquer the French islands; and, above all, prevent that commercial and maritime union between France and the United States, on which alone France can hope to engraft a naval superiority.

It may be asked why these jealousies, that I appear so greatly to apprehend with respect to France, do not prevail with respect to Britain in possession of Canada.

First, because Britain has, very prudently, separated her territory by a natural boundary, which keeps the inhabitants of the respective nations from coming into contact. While she held posts on the south sides of the lakes, the United States viewed her with jealousy, and there is no sort of doubt that hostilities and national hatred would have been the consequences of her retaining them, when the American population in their neighborhood had increased; symptoms of which had frequently been exhibited, before they were relinquished. Second, because the natural export of the United States being by their own rivers, there is no communication of any moment between them and Canada: but thirdly, because Upper Canada is principally settled by emigrants from the United States, who, in case of a rupture, would probably join them if the spirit of the American Government did not prohibit an extension of their limits.

And, after all, what advantages, political or commercial, can France obtain by the possession of New Orleans and the east side of the Mississippi, that can compensate for the losses she will sustain in both respects, by placing herself in a state of rivalry with the United States? The Floridas are a narrow slip of very barren lands, absolutely indefensible in case of a rupture, and which will require more than they are worth in guards, garrisons, and Indian subsidies: and however valuable New Orleans may be to the United States, it will be of little value to France, when the foreign capital shall be withdrawn from it, or a rival city established by the United States. I find, upon the most careful inquiry, that one-third of the mercantile houses now employed in New Orleans belongs to the citizens of the United States. No sooner shall a military Government be established there, than these houses, with all the capital that gives activity to the commerce of New Orleans, will be removed either to such other place as the United States shall receive agreeably to the terms of their treaty with Spain, or to the Natchez, to which any vessel that may enter at New Orleans can be received. Large vessels have already gone from France, and unloaded their cargoes there without any difficulty. As the market is always the better the further you advance, there is little doubt that this will become a rival city to that of New Orleans; and when the American capital shall be withdrawn from the latter, when the Government of the United States shall declare it a port free of duties, New Orleans will become of little consequence as a commercial city, and only remain a useless expense to France, and a source of endless jealousies between them and the United States.

The cession of Louisiana is, however, very important to France if she avails herself of it in the only way that sound policy would dictate. I speak of Louisiana proper; in which I do not include the Floridas, presuming that they make no part of the cession. Since, by this cession, she may acquire a right to navigate the Mississippi, and a free trade: and if she knows how to avail herself of this circumstance by a perfect understanding with the United States, she will find a vent through it for a vast variety of her commodities when she has given the people of the Western States the habit of consuming them, in preference to those they receive from Britain. This can only be done by affording them cheaper. She can only afford them cheaper by interesting the American merchant in their sale, and having the use of his capital, and, by engaging the Government of the United States to give them a preference. These objects can only be obtained by a cession of New Orleans to the United States, with a reservation of a right of entry, at all times, free of any other duties than such as are exacted from the vessels of the United States; together with a right to navigate the Mississippi. This will give her ships an advantage over those of every other nation, will retain and increase the capital of New Orleans, from which her supplies for her islands will be purchased on the easiest terms, will carry the fabrics of France into all the Western territory, which the United States will have no interest in checking, as all rivalry between the two nations would then be removed. France will then command the respect, without exciting the fear of the two nations whose friendship is most important to her commerce, and to the preservation of her islands; and all this without the expense of establishments that would drain the national treasury, and divert the national capital from its proper objects; while, on the other hand, should France retain New Orleans, and endeavor to colonize Louisiana, she will render herself an object of jealousy to Spain, the United States, and Britain, who will not only discourage her commerce, but compel her to make expensive establishments for the security of her rights.

In reasoning upon this subject, I have confined myself to such observations as obviously presented themselves, without seeking any of those subtleties which might serve to mislead the judgment. I have candidly exposed the plainest facts, in the simplest language. If ever they are opposed, it will be by a contrary course. Eloquence and sophistry may reply to and may obscure them; but time and experience will evince their truth.

Extract:—Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 16, 1802.

I informed you in my last letter that I found some relaxation on the subject of the Floridas in my last conversation with the Spanish minister. I have reason to think that within these few days they have come to a settlement with France on that subject. What it is, I cannot precisely say; but I presume it is whatever France wishes it to be. I find all the old French maps mark the river Perdido as the boundary between Florida and Louisiana. It is possible that this may have been insisted upon. If so, the remainder was hardly worth the keeping. Whatever it is, the project of taking possession has resumed a certain degree of activity. General Victor is appointed. He is to have under him a general of division, two generals of brigade, and three thousand men only. No more than two millions of francs are allowed to this service; so that they must starve or find resources in the country. Saturday the General was all day with the Minister of Marine, arranging the inferior appointments to be submitted to the First Consul. I have been pressing, for some time past, with every body that I thought could have any influence in this business. And, as I have been happy enough to convince most of them, I do not absolutely despair; though I am much discouraged, from this last arrangement. The same silence is observed by the minister. I can get him to tell me nothing. I shall see him this morning again, and if I cannot induce him to speak on the subject more plainly than he has done, I will put in a note insisting on our claims under the Spanish treaty, and demanding an explicit recognition of them. On this I believe there will be little difficulty, as they have always agreed that the cession must be subject to the restrictions under which Spain held the territory. There are obvious symptoms of ill humor between this country and Britain, and I think it will not be long before they assume a serious aspect. Good may arise out of this evil, if it should happen.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, August 19, 1802.

SIR:

I write in haste, in hopes that this may overtake Mr. Lyle, and correct an error in my last. Notwithstanding the appointment of General Victor, and several other officers for Louisiana, among others a comptroller of the forests, no prefect is yet appointed. Nor is the difference relative to the Floridas settled. Spain insists that they are not ceded; and I have certain information that, two days ago, the Minister of Marine wrote to the Minister of Foreign Affairs that without the Floridas there could be no Louisiana. Nothing shall be neglected on my part to keep up this difference: for, while it lasts, there will, I believe, be no expedition; and time and change may work in our favor.

I am, sir, &c. &c.

R. R. L.

Mr. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, September 1, 1802.

SIR:

I yesterday made several propositions to the minister on the subject of Louisiana. He told me frankly, that every offer was premature; that the French Government had determined to take possession first; so that you must consider the business as absolutely determined on. The armament is what I have already mentioned, and will be ready in about six weeks. I have every reason to believe the Floridas are not included. They will, for the present, at least, remain in the hands of Spain. There never was a Government in which less could be done by negotiation than here. There is no people, no Legislature, no counsellors. One man is every thing. He seldom asks advice, and never hears it unasked. His ministers are mere clerks; and his Legislature and counsellors parade officers. Though the sense of every reflecting man about him is against this wild expedition, no one dares to tell him so. Were it not for the uneasiness it excites at home, it would give me none: for I am persuaded that the whole will end in a relinquishment of the country, and transfer of the capital to the United States. Their islands call for much more than France can ever furnish. The extreme hauteur of this Government to all around them will not suffer peace to be of long continuance. The French minister at Lisbon, it is said, is coming home without taking leave. England is very sour; the debts due the northern Powers unpaid, as well as ours, though their justice is admitted. Helvetia is still in arms; the little Cantons not acceding to the new form of government.

I propose to make an excursion of about fifteen days into the Low Countries, as I find nothing pressing at this moment here that I can forward by my stay.

I am, sir, &c. &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 15, 1802.

The suspense which has taken place in relation to Louisiana and the Floridas is favorable to the efforts for diverting the French Government from its unwise project. Whether we regard the sentiments prevailing in this country on the subject, or the striking tendencies of the project itself, no pains ought to be spared for putting an end to it. If the occasion can be so improved as to obtain for the United States, on convenient terms, New Orleans and Florida, the happiest of issues will be given to one of the most perplexing of occurrences. I postpone more particular remarks on this subject until the President shall know the impressions on the French councils, resulting from the views of it to which you will be led by the despatches of which Mr. Dupont was the bearer.

Mr. Livingston to the President of the United States.

PARIS, October 28, 1802.

DEAR SIR:

Nothing very important having occurred for some time past, I have not thought it necessary to trouble you, particularly as I concluded that you would, for a time, have quitted the seat of Government, and sought repose from the fatigues of politics.

While the union between France and Russia subsists, the discontents which almost every nation in Europe feels at the extreme loftiness of the first will be suppressed. But as fear and not affection occasions the suppression, they are ready to break out on the first favorable moment. Many think that moment not very distant. Great changes have taken place in the administration: Wormzoff is known to be inclined to Britain; and I find that the change occasions considerable sensation here, not only among the foreign ministers, but among those of France. One effect of it has been to send off Andriotte, who has hitherto been retained till Lord Whitworth arrived, even though formal notice had long since been given that he was to go in eight days. Britain is seriously dissatisfied; and, indeed, has some reason to complain; several of her vessels which put in here, (as is said by stress of weather,) having been detained, and Mr. Murray's representations treated with neglect.

The affairs of Helvetia have also excited great uneasiness in England, where all parties seem to concur in wishing to oppose some barriers to the power of France. The British republicans are disgusted with the changes which have taken place here; while the royalists dread the stability that the Government has assumed in the hands of the First Consul. The mercantile and manufacturing interests, who looked to peace for the renewal of the treaty of commerce, from which they derived such advantages, are sore at the severity with which their commerce is interdicted here. You will accordingly find, by the British papers, that both those of the majority and minority teem with abuse on France, and blow aloud the trumpet of discord.

By the treaty of Madrid, you recollect that the reigning Duke of Parma and Placentia was to renounce them in favor of France; in consideration of which, his heir was to have the kingdom of Etruria. This he has constantly refused to do, and has lately died without making any renunciation. The Spanish ambassador here has been called upon to complete the treaty. He replied that he had no powers. And General Bournonville has gone express to Spain to effect this object—the King of Etruria being now Duke of Parma. Whether he will prefer the crown he now holds to his hereditary dominions I know not; but I think he must submit to what is dictated here, or risk the loss of both.

The Mississippi business, though all the officers are appointed, and the army under orders, has met with a check. The army under orders is obstructed for the moment. Events may possibly arise, of which we may avail ourselves.

I had, two days ago, a very interesting conversation with Joseph Bonaparte, having put into his hands a copy of the memoir on Louisiana, which I sent the Secretary of State. I took occasion to tell him that the interest he had taken in settling the differences between our respective countries had entitled him to our confidence, and that I should take the liberty to ask his advice in matters that were likely to disturb the harmony that subsisted between our respective republics. He seemed pleased at the compliment, and told me that he would receive with pleasure any communication I could make; but as he would not wish to appear to interfere with the minister, he begged my communication might be informal and unsigned—exactly what I wished, because I should act with less danger of committing myself, and of course with more freedom. He added, you must not, however, suppose my power to serve you greater than it actually is; my brother is his own counsellor; but we are good brothers, he hears me with pleasure, and as I have access to him at all times, I have an opportunity of turning his attention to a particular subject that might otherwise be passed over. I then asked him whether he had read my notes on Louisiana. He told me he had, and that he had conversed upon the subject with the First Consul, who, he found, had read them with attention; that his brother had told him that he had nothing more at heart than to be upon the best terms with the United States. I expressed to him my apprehensions of the jealousies that would naturally be excited from their vicinity, and the impossibility of preventing abuses in a military government established at so great a distance from home.

Wishing to know with certainty whether the Floridas were included, (which, however, I had pretty well ascertained before,) I told him that the only cause of difference that might arise between us being the debt and Louisiana, I conceived that both might be happily and easily removed by making an exchange with Spain, returning them Louisiana, retaining New Orleans, and giving the latter and the Floridas for our debt.

He asked me whether we should prefer the Floridas to Louisiana? I told him that there was no comparison in their value, but that we had no wish to extend our boundary across the Mississippi, or give color to the doubts that had been entertained of the moderation of our views; that all we sought was security, and not extension of territory. He replied, that he believed any new cession on the part of Spain would be extremely difficult; that Spain had parted with Trinidad and Louisiana with great reluctance. I have, however, reason to think that Bournonville is instructed to effect this object, not, however, with a view to my project, but with intention to procure for France some part in the Gulf, from which they think they may secure their own and annoy the British commerce; so that, if we should, contrary to our hopes, make any bargain with them, I fear that East Florida will not be included. However, every thing is yet in air; and I doubt much, considering the present state of things in Europe, whether Spain will make any exchange that will give France a command of the Gulf. Though this is a favorite object with France, she may not, in the present state of things in Europe, think it prudent to press too hard. It is time that she should acquire some character for moderation.

The First Consul is gone to Rouen, and is to be back by the 18th Brumaire. The British fear he means to examine the coasts. The prospect of a rupture grows more serious. I can tell you, with certainty, that a remonstrance, in pretty strong terms, has been presented by her minister, on the subject of the Consul's interference in the affairs of Helvetia. How it will be received I know not; but I think it would not have been made if it had not been the intention of Britain to seek a quarrel.

I refer you to the Secretary of State for information on our particular affairs.

Lafayette's situation demands the aid of our country. * * * * He was ready to sacrifice every thing for us, and we owe him something effectual. I must pray you to get Mr. Randolph, or some other leading mem- of Congress, to patronize him. Our gratitude will do us honor abroad, and not be unpopular at home.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, Esq., President of the United States.

Extract:—Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, to James Madison, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 2, 1802.

My letter to the President, sent by the way of England, will show you that the business of Louisiana has met with a check, though I fear it will be soon resumed; and that troops will go out this autumn, as every thing was arranged, and they were under marching orders. Florida is not, as I before told you, included in the cession. You will see in the President's letter my conversation with Joseph Bonaparte; this I shall have a convenient opportunity to renew, as he has promised to give me a shooting party at his country house in a few days. Time may afford circumstances of which we may avail ourselves. I therefore pray you to be explicit in your instructions, and in your replies to some questions that I have asked you relative to this subject in my former letters, since I am at present wholly unauthorized as to any offers that it would be proper to make; and we certainly do not expect to receive this country, or any interest in it, as a free gift.

Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, to James Madison, Secretary of State, dated

PARIS, November 11, 1802.

France has then cut the knot. The difficulty relative to Parma and Placentia, that stopped the expedition to Louisiana, has ended by their taking possession of the first, as you see by the enclosed paper. Orders are given for the immediate embarkation of troops (two demi-brigades) for Louisiana; they will sail in about twenty days from Holland. The Government here will give no answer to my notes on the subject. They will say nothing on that of our limits, or of our right under the Spanish treaty. Clarke has been presented to General Victor as a merchant from Louisiana. The General did not probably conceal his views, which are nothing short of taking exactly what they find convenient. When asked what they meant to do as to our right of entrepôt, he spoke of the treaty as waste paper; and the prefect did not know that we had such right, though it had been the subject of many conversations with the minister, and of three different notes. The sum voted for this service is two millions and a half; as to the rest, they expect to compel the people to support the expenses of the Government, which will be very heavy, as the number of the officers, civil and military, with their suite, is great; and they are not empowered to draw: so that the first act of the new Government will be the oppression of their people and of our commerce. I believe you may add to this an early attempt to corrupt our Western people, and, if I may judge by the temper that the General will carry with him, an early attempt upon the Natchez, which they consider as the rival of New Orleans. If you will look back to some of my letters on this subject, you will see my opinion of the necessity of strengthening ourselves by force and ships at home, and by alliance abroad. No prudence will, I fear, prevent hostilities ere long; and perhaps the sooner their plans develop themselves the better. In a letter to the President, sent by the way of England, I mention a conversation with Joseph Bonaparte, from which I derive some small hopes; but they are of no avail now that the expedition is determined upon. I had yesterday written you a long letter upon the general state of our affairs, but, having no one to copy it, and being anxious to give you this intelligence as early as possible, I confine myself to this single object, lest I should miss the ship which is about to sail from Havre.

I am, dear sir, with the most respectful consideration, your most obedient servant,

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, to James Madison, Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 11, 1802.

SIR:

After writing mine of this date, I called on the minister and insisted on some positive answer to my notes. He told me that he was expressly instructed by the First Consul to give me the most positive assurances that the treaties we had entered into with Spain or them, relative to Louisiana, should be strictly observed. When I expressed my surprise that their officers should not be informed on that head, though on the eve of departing, he assured me that they would be furnished with copies of the treaties, and directed to conform strictly to them. I asked why these assurances were not given me, in the usual form, by replying to my notes? He said that he hoped that there would be no difficulty on that head, when the Consul should arrive (he is now absent). I have stated this that you might, by comparing this conversation with the contents of the letter, and the information derived from Clarke's conversation with the General, draw your own inferences. I shall endeavor to-day to see J. Bonaparte, though he has all along assured me that it was the Consul's intention to cultivate our friendship, and by no means to do any thing that would endanger it. It will, however, be well to be on our guard, and, above all, to reinforce the Natchez, and to give it every possible commercial advantage. If we can put ourselves in a situation to prevent the danger of hostility, I think we may hope that the dissatisfaction of inhabitants, the disappointment of officers, and the drain of money which the establishment will occasion, will facilitate our views after a very short time.

I am, dear sir, with the most respectful consideration, your most obedient servant,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

P. S. In my letter to the President, I informed him that General Bournonville had gone post to Spain, and that I had reason to think he had it in charge to obtain the Floridas. I know that he went with the greatest speed; accordingly, on his very first conference, he proposed to Spain to relinquish Parma and Placentia for the Floridas.* * * * * * * But Spain may be forced to give them, though she should not like the exchange. You see by this how much it is a favorite object with the First Consul, and judge from thence of our prospects.

What effect the news from St. Domingo may have I know not. The army there is reduced to one thousand two hundred effectives. Other particulars you will have more correctly than we have here.

The Consul is still absent, but daily expected. Lord Whitworth is on his way from Calais, and will be here to-morrow.

Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, to James Madison, Secretary of State.

PARIS, November 14, 1802.

In addition to my last, (duplicates enclosed,) I have obtained accurate information of the offer to Spain. It is either to sell them Parma for forty-eight millions of livres, or to exchange it for Florida. You see by this the value they put on Florida. I fear Spain will accede to their proposition. Lord Whitworth has arrived. The affairs of Switzerland are in a train to be settled as France thinks proper; the Diet being dissolved, and deputies appointed to come to Paris. Sweden has made a peace with Tripoli, for which she pays one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The Emperor is not yet satisfied with the indemnities, and there are many symptoms of change in the politics of Russia.

Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain, dated DEPARTMENT OF STATE, November 27, 1802.

A letter from a confidential citizen at New Orleans, a copy of which is enclosed, has just informed us that the Intendant at that place by a proclamation, from which an extract is also enclosed, had prohibited the deposite of American effects stipulated by the treaty of 1795; and, as the letter is interpreted, that the river was also shut against the external commerce of the United States from that port. Whether it be the fact or not that this latter prohibition has also taken place, it is evident that the useful navigation of the Mississippi so essentially depends on a suitable depository for the articles of commerce that a privation of the latter is equivalent to a privation of both.

This proceeding is so direct and palpable a violation of the treaty of 1795, that, in candor, it is to be imputed rather to the Intendant solely, than to instructions of his Government. The Spanish minister takes pains to impress this belief, and it is favored by private accounts from New Orleans, mentioning that the Governor did not concur with the Intendant. But, from whatever source the measure may have proceeded, the President expects that the Spanish Government will neither lose a moment in countermanding it, nor hesitate to repair every damage which may result from it. You are aware of the sensibility of our Western citizens to such an occurrence. This sensibility is justified by the interest they have at stake. The Mississippi is to them every thing. It is the Hudson, the Delaware, the Potomac, and all the navigable rivers of the Atlantic States, formed into one stream. The produce exported through that channel last year amounted to one million six hundred and twenty-two thousand six hundred and seventy-two dollars from the districts of Kentucky and Mississippi only, and will probably be fifty per cent. more this year, (from the whole Western country, Kentucky alone has exported, for the first half of this year, five hundred and ninety-one thousand four hundred and thirty-two dollars in value) a great part of which is now, or shortly will be, afloat for New Orleans, and consequently exposed to the effects of this extraordinary exercise of power. Whilst you presume, therefore, in your representations to the Spanish Government that the conduct of its officer is no less contrary to its intentions than it is to its good faith, you will take care to express the strongest confidence that the breach of the treaty will be repaired in every way which justice and a regard for a friendly neighborhood may require.

I have communicated the information received from New Orleans to the Chevalier d'Yrujo, with a view to obtain his immediate interposition, as you will find by the enclosed copy of a letter to him. He readily undertakes to use it with all the effect he can give it by writing immediately on the subject to the local authority at New Orleans. I shall write at the same time to Mr. Hulings, who will enforce, as far as he may have an opportunity, the motives for recalling the unwarrantable prohibitions. It is to be hoped that the Intendant will be led to see the error which he has committed, and to correct it before a very great share of its mischief will have happened. Should he prove as obstinate as he has been ignorant or wicked, nothing can temper the irritation and indignation of the Western country, but a persuasion that the energy of their own Government will obtain from the justice of that of Spain the most ample redress.

It has long been manifest that, whilst the injuries to the United States, so frequently occurring, from the colonial officers scattered over our hemisphere, and in our neighborhood, can only be repaired by a resort to their respective sovereigns in Europe, that it will be impossible to guard against most serious inconveniences. The instance before us strikes with peculiar force, and presents an occasion on which you may advantageously suggest to the Spanish Government the expediency of placing in their minister on the spot, an authority to control or correct the mischievous proceedings of their colonial officers towards our citizens; without which any one of fifteen or twenty individuals, not always among either the wisest or best of men, may, at any time, threaten the good understanding of the two countries. The distance between the United States and the old continent, and the mortifying delays of explanations and negotiations across the Atlantic on emergencies in our neighborhood, render such a provision indispensable, and it cannot be long before all the Governments of Europe, having American colonies, must see the policy of making it.

Extract from the message of the President of the United States to Congress, dated

DECEMBER 15, 1802.

The cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France, which took place in the course of the late war, will, if carried into effect make a change in the aspect of our foreign relations, which will doubtless have just weight in any deliberations of the Legislature connected with that subject.

* Nearly a line here is too illegible to be safely conjectured.

Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, to James Madison, Secretary of State.

PARIS, December 20, 1802.

SIR:

I have received your favor by Mde. Broniau, and had, as you will find, anticipated your wishes in finding another manual to the First Consul. The consequence of which is, that I have at this moment a very strong memorial under his eye, and some projects which appear to be well received. But the subject is too delicate to treat here: when a safe conveyance offers I shall write to you more at large. The minister has changed his conduct much for the better, either because of our late difference, or because he suspects that I have another passage to the First Consul. France has not yet got Florida; but there is not much doubt that her negotiations on this subject will succeed, as Parma is a favorite object with Spain. Pray be explicit in the amount of what I may offer, and consider the value of the country—its importance to peace—the expensive establishment it will save—and its intrinsic worth from the price of the land and actual revenue. I do not, however, mean that you should infer from this that my prospects of obtaining the object are great, because I find, as Mr. Talleyrand told me yesterday, the First Consul entété with this project. But I have made so many converts, that I would wish, in case favorable circumstances should arise, to know how to act. If left to myself I may go beyond the mark. General politics you will collect from the papers I send. I have mentioned that the storm in England will blow over for the present; and the peace will not be lasting. The armament for Louisiana has not yet sailed; the civil officers are yet here, if I am rightly informed by the minister from whom I had it yesterday.

The necessity of my sending this immediately prevents my adding any thing but my assurance of the highest esteem.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

P. S. December 23d. The armament has not yet sailed; Florida not ceded; more hesitation and doubt on the subject than I have yet observed. I have, in a private memoir under the Consul's eye, touched a string that has alarmed them. I cannot now explain. The minister knows nothing of this. Set on foot a negotiation fixing our bound with Britain, but by no means conclude until you hear from me that all hope here is lost. It is an important card in my hands, and must, for the present at least, be somewhat under my control. Do not absolutely despair, though you may have no great reason to hope should New Orleans be possessed by a small force.

This letter goes by the way of England by Mr. Murray, who has not allowed me time to give it you in any better dress. I must wait for some more direct conveyance to write fully to you.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, December 23, 1802.

SIR:

In the latter end of last month we received information from New Orleans of the interdiction of the deposite there for our merchandise, stipulated by the treaty with Spain, without an equivalent establishment being assigned. A copy of the Intendant's proclamation to that effect is enclosed. Private accounts render it probable that the Governor of the province openly dissented from that act; but private letters, of so late a date as the 29th of October, inform us that it is still enforced. The Legislature of Kentucky have voted a memorial to Congress complaining of it, and they will, probably, be followed by other portions of the Western people. Should it not be revoked before the time for the descent of the boats in the spring, both the injury and irritation proceeding from it will be greatly increased. The House of Representatives passed a resolution on the 17th of this month calling for information upon this subject, a copy of which, if it should be printed early enough, will be enclosed. The result of their deliberations cannot be anticipated: but I may hazard the remark that, whilst we have no clear foundation on which to impute this infraction to orders from the Spanish Government, it would be contrary to the duty, policy, and character of our own to resort for redress in the first instance to the use of force.

JANUARY 3, 1803.

The delay in the sailing of the British packet, by which this is forwarded, gives an opportunity of adding that, since the date of the above, a letter has been received from Governor Claiborne, of the Mississippi territory, enclosing one from the Governor of Louisiana, which says that the suspension of the deposite by the Intendant was without orders from the Spanish Government, and that the measure did not accord with his judgment. He observes, also, that he had communicated the proceeding to the Governor of the Havana, who has some kind of superintendence over the authorities at New Orleans. This information strengthens the hope that the irregularity may be corrected before it can have wrought extensive injury to our Mississippi commerce. The occurrence has drawn forth the clearest indications, not only of the sensibility of the Western country with respect to the navigation of the Mississippi, but of the sympathy of their Atlantic fellow citizens on the subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON, ESQ.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney, minister to Spain.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 10, 1803.

SIR:

Since my letter of November 27th, on the subject of what had taken place at New Orleans, a letter has been received from the Governor of Louisiana to Gov. Claiborne, in which it is stated that the measure of the Intendant was without instructions from his Government, and admitted that his own judgment did not concur with that of the Intendant. You will find, by the printed documents herewith transmitted, that the subject engaged the early and earnest attention of the House of Representatives; and that all the information relating to it, possessed by the Executive prior to the receipt of that letter, was reported, in consequence of a call for it. The letter itself has been added to that report; but being confidentially communicated, it does not appear in print; a translation of it, however, is herewith enclosed. You will find, also, that the House has passed a resolution explicitly declaring that the stipulated rights of the United States on the Mississippi will be inviolably maintained. The disposition of many members was to give to the resolution a tone and complexion still stronger. To these proofs of the sensation which has been produced, it is to be added, that representations, expressing the peculiar sensibility of the Western country, are on the way from every quarter of it to the Government. There is, in fact, but one sentiment throughout the Union with respect to the duty of maintaining our rights of navigation and boundary. The only existing difference relates to the degree of patience which ought to be exercised during the appeal to friendly modes of redress. In this state of things, it is to be presumed, that the Spanish Government will accelerate, by every possible means, its interposition for that purpose; and the President charges you to urge the necessity of so doing with as much amicable decision as you can employ. We are not without hopes that the Intendant will yield to the demands which have been made on him: and to the advice which he will have received from the Spanish minister here. But it will be expected from the justice and good faith of the Spanish Government, that its precise orders to that effect will be forwarded by the quickest conveyance possible. The President wishes, also, that the expedient suggested in the letter above referred to, for preventing similar occurrences and delays, may also be duly pressed on that Government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

CHARLES PINCKNEY, Esq. &c. &c.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 18, 1803.

SIR:

My letters of December 23d and January 3d communicated the information which had been received at those dates, relating to the violation, at New Orleans, of our treaty with Spain; together with what had then passed between the House of Representatives and the Executive on the subject. I now enclose a subsequent resolution of that branch of the Legislature. Such of the debates connected with it as took place with open doors will be seen in the newspapers; which it is expected will be forwarded by the Collector at New York by the present opportunity. In these debates, as well as in indications from the press, you will perceive, as you would readily suppose, that the cession of Louisiana to France has been associated as a ground of much solicitude with the affair at New Orleans. Such, indeed, has been the impulse given to the public mind by these events, that every branch of the Government has felt the obligation of taking the measures most likely, not only to re-establish our present rights, but to promote arrangements by which they may be enlarged, and more effectually secured. In deliberating on this subject, it has appeared to the President that the importance of the crisis called for the experiment of an extraordinary mission; carrying with it the weight attached to such a measure, as well as the advantage of a more thorough knowledge of the views of the Government, and the sensibility of the people, than could be otherwise conveyed. He has, accordingly, selected for this service, with the approbation of the Senate, Mr. Monroe, formerly our minister plenipotentiary at Paris, and lately Governor of the State of Virginia; who will be joined with yourself in a commission extraordinary to treat with the French republic; and with Mr. Pinckney in a like commission to treat, if necessary, with the Spanish Government. The President has been careful, on this occasion, to guard effectually against any possible misconstructions in relation to yourself, by expressing, in his message to the Senate, his undiminished confidence in the ordinary representation of the United States, and by referring the advantages of the additional mission to considerations perfectly consistent therewith.

Mr. Monroe will be the bearer of the instructions under which you are jointly to negotiate. The object of them will be to procure a cession of New Orleans and the Floridas to the United States; and consequently the establishment of the Mississippi as the boundary between the United States and Louisiana. In order to draw the French Government into the measure, a sum of money will mark part of our propositions; to which will be added, such regulations of the commerce of that river, and of the others entering the Gulf of Mexico, as ought to be satisfactory to France. From a letter, received by the President from the respectable person alluded to in my last, it is inferred, with probability, that the French Government is not averse to treat on those grounds. And such a disposition must be strengthened by the circumstances of the present moment.

I have thought it proper to communicate thus much to you, without waiting for the departure of Mr. Monroe, who will not be able to sail for two weeks, or perhaps more. I need not suggest to you that, in disclosing this diplomatic arrangement to the French Government, and preparing the way for the object of it, the utmost care is to be used in repressing extravagant anticipations of the terms to be offered by the United States, particularly the sum of money to be thrown into the transaction. The ultimatum on this point will be settled before the departure of Mr. Monroe, and will be communicated by him. The sum hinted at in the letter to the President above referred to, is —— livres. If less will not do we are prepared to meet it; but it is hoped that less will do, and the prospect of accommodation will concur with other motives in postponing the expedition to Louisiana. For the present I barely remark, that a proposition made to Congress with closed doors is under consideration, which, if agreed to, will authorise the payment of about ten millions of livres, under arrangement of time and place that may be so convenient to the French Government as to invite a prompt as well as favorable decision of the case. The sum to which the proposition is limited, and which will probably not be effectually concealed, may, at the same time, assist in keeping down the pecuniary expectations of the French cabinet.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON, Esq. &c.

Extract:—Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to Mr. Charles Pinckney, American minister at Madrid.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 18, 1803.

[After informing Mr. Pinckney, as well as Mr. Livingston, of the reasons which had induced the mission of Mr. Monroe, this letter proceeds as follows:]

The President has been careful on this occasion to guard effectually against any misconstruction, in relation to yourself, by expressing, in his message to the Senate, his undiminished confidence in the ordinary representation of the United States, and by referring the advantages of the additional mission to considerations perfectly consistent therewith.

Mr. Monroe will be the bearer of the instructions under which you are to negotiate. The object of them will be, to procure a cession of New Orleans and the Floridas of the United States, and consequently, the establishment of the Mississippi as the boundary between the United States and Louisiana. In order to draw the French Government into the measure, a sum of money will make part of our propositions; to which will be added such regulations of the commerce of that river, and of the others entering the Gulf of Mexico as ought to be satisfactory to France. From a letter received by the President from a respectable person, it is inferred, with probability, that the French Government is not averse to treat on those grounds; and such a disposition must be strengthened by the circumstances of the present moment.

Though it is probable that this mission will be completed at Paris, if its objects are at all attainable, yet it was necessary to apprise you thus far of what is contemplated, both for your own satisfaction, and that you may be prepared to co-operate on the occasion, as circumstances may demand. Mr. Monroe will not be able to sail for two weeks.

Robert R. Livingston, minister to France, to James Madison, Secretary of State.

PARIS, January 24, 1803.

SIR:

I have just now heard of an opportunity from Havre. I am doubtful whether my letter will arrive in time for it. I therefore confine myself to inform you that General Bernadotte is named minister to the United States, in the place of Otto, who will be employed here. General Bernadotte is brother-in-law to Joseph Bonaparte, is a very respectable man, and has the character of a decided republican. I have endeavoured to impress upon him the necessity of making some arrangements relative to the debt previous to his departure, which he has much at heart.

But neither he nor any body else can influence the councils of the First Consul. You can hardly conceive any thing more timid than all about him are: they dare not be known to have a sentiment of their own, or to have expressed one to any body. But I must defer writing to you more at large on this subject, as well as a full communication of a very delicate step that I have hazarded, which promised success for some time, but from which I, at present, hope for no important result. The minister informs me that the expedition to Louisiana will sail shortly. General Bernadotte will go in about three weeks. He will have full powers to settle every thing. I asked the minister, what confidence you can have in any new offer to treat, when the last treaty is unexecuted; and if he had not better send out General Benadotte with a treaty in his hand, than only with powers that will be suspected; and how he can make arrangements upon the debts which must depend upon the Legislature? He answers this by saying, they want information as to right of deposite, &c. As to the debt, I have no hope that they have any intention to pay it, or even to fund it. From the disposition which I know to be entertained by some that go out with Victor, I have no doubt that they will provoke an Indian war, by paying them nothing; and that in their solicitude to acquire wealth, they will act over again the tyranny of St. Domingo. It will be necessary, therefore, to take the position that will best guard you against the effects of these evils. As to myself, I am left wholly without any precise instruction how to act, or what to offer. Enclosed are two memoirs lately sent in, with as little effect as those that have gone before them; though I have reason to think that the minister wishes well to my project for Louisiana, but the First Consul is immoveable. I confess to you I see very little use for a minister here, where there is but one will; and that will governed by no object but personal security and personal ambition: were it left to my discretion, I should bring matters to some positive issue, or leave them, which would be the only means of bringing them to an issue. I am, &c.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

Honorable JAMES MADISON, &c.

No. 4.

Mr. Livingston to —— ——.

DECEMBER 24, 1802.*

SIR:

I cannot but feel the utmost anxiety to know whether my project, which you had the goodness to submit to the inspection of the First Consul, is likely to meet with his concurrence. Upon ordinary occasions I should consider the delay of a few weeks as of little moment; but there are circumstances which render every day important in what relates to the United States and France. In the twelve months that I have been here, I have not been so happy as to receive a conclusive answer to any one business that I have had to transact with the minister. Congress are now in session; they will infer from every paper submitted to them by the President, that the French Government are disposed to show them but little attention. The obscurity that covers the designs of France in Louisiana (for not the least light can I, officially, obtain on the subject,) will double their apprehensions; this, added to the clamors of ruined creditors, and the extreme severity with which some of their citizens have been treated in St. Domingo, and the extraordinary decisions of the Council of Prizes, &c. will leave a fair field for the intrigues of the enemies of France, and even enlist the best patriots of America on their side. At this moment Britain comes forward and pays, with the most scrupulous attention, every demand, and proposes to settle her southwestern line with the United States. In doing this she is anxious to come down to a navigable part of the Mississippi, so as to communicate with Canada by that channel. It is obvious that she can have no interest in this, but such as looks to the future possession of the mouth of that river: a project that she would naturally form the moment she saw Louisiana pass into the hands of her rival. I am sorry to say it is one that she will find no difficulty in executing, unless prevented by the United States: for France is too far to protect a young colony from an established one, and the numerous savages, provincial troops, and others, that Canada will afford. While the conduct of France speaks a language so painful to the feelings of the American Government, there is too much reason to believe that there will be little solicitude in so forming their limits as to cover her possessions. I am anxious, sir, to know our prospects. If they should be such as I flatter myself the mutual interests of France and the United States would lead to, I would wish to have it in my power to arrest in Mr. King's hands any conclusion on the subject of our western bounds. In case my project should be honored with the approbation of the First Consul, it will be essential to the security of the possessions of France and the peace of that country, to remove the British boundary as high up the river as possible, so as to prevent any communication with Canada, by the rivers that fall on the one side into the lakes, and, on the other, into the Mississippi. If this business is obstructed only by the non-conclusion of the treaty with Spain for the Floridas, one may still go between us for New Orleans and the territory above the Arkansas river, with a condition annexed, in case the treaty with the Floridas should succeed agreeably to the wishes of France. Should the treaty with Spain fall through, every reason of policy should induce France, either to relinquish her designs on Louisiana altogether, or to cover her frontier by a cession to the United States; since, without a single port in the Gulf, it will be impossible to protect their colony; and all the expense incurred by the attempt will ultimately redound to the advantage of Britain, who will not fail to attack them with advantage both by sea and land.

The treaty I propose might also form a basis for the immediate discharge of the debts due to our citizens; in the doing of which, advantageous arrangements may be made, and, at the same time, the funds of France be considerably raised: provided such secrecy is observed in the whole of this transaction as will prevent the debts being the object of speculation. I know, sir, a distinction has been taken between debts due from the former Government and that which now happily prevails in France. But, sir, if this distinction is just it does not apply to the demands of the United States. They are specifically assumed by the new Government, when they made the object of the treaty, and an equivalent has already been paid the present Government by that of the United States: so that they stand upon a different ground from that of the debts of other nations having demands on France: and they not only have to plead their justice, and the circumstances under which they were contracted, but the pledged faith of the existing Government.

I cannot, sir, but be solicitous to know that what I have hitherto taken the liberty to write to you has passed into no hands but those of the First Consul, or some other member of your own family, as I fear my communications out of the ordinary channel might be ill taken where I am solicitous to stand well.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the most profound consideration, your most obedient servant,

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

[Referred to in Mr. Livingston's despatch of January 24, 1803.]

Mr. Livingston to the Minister of Exterior Relations.

The undersigned Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, to His Excellency the Minister of Exterior Relations. †

SIR:

I have so often had occasion to mention to you the claims of American citizens upon the French Government, and, with so little effect, that I feel pain whenever I am compelled to touch upon that subject. But, sir, I never had reason to doubt, both from the tenor of your note, and conversations, that it would become a question whether these debts, just in themselves, and solemnly confirmed by a treaty, should become the subject of liquidation. The Board of Accounts accordingly proceeded to liquidate and give certificates for about one-quarter of the whole amount. Upon the debt so liquidated the American merchant was enabled to raise the small sums necessary for his support, till arrangements were made (which they never permitted themselves to doubt would be finally done) for their discharge. But, sir, even of this support they are now deprived: for though the Board has proceeded to liquidate more of their claims, the gentleman at the head of the Department refuses to give the usual certificates; under what pretence I am at a loss to conceive. I am told he considers the treaty as applying to debts contracted during the present Government, when in fact no such debts existed at the time of the treaty, nor is there a word in the treaty which authorizes such construction; the whole treaty referring to matters that had passed not only under the Government that had preceded the present, but under that which preceded the Revolution. Upon what other principle has the United States, with the strictest good faith, paid the debt contracted under Louis XVI. and those which the existing Government demanded under the late Convention for injuries sustained under the late Directors?

It is time, sir, that matters should be brought to some issue; that the citizens of the United States and their Government should know how far the treaty is binding upon France: and what construction ought to be given to it, for, hitherto, it has only served as a means to surprise their good faith, and to involve both the Government and the people of the United States in fresh expenses.

I have the honor to renew to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration.

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

[Referred to in Mr. Livingston's despatch of 24th January.]

Robert R. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, to the Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, January 10, 1803.

SIR:

I have just learned through a channel, which, though not official, is such as leaves me no doubt of its authenticity, that the Governor of New Orleans has denied the citizens of the United States a right of depot there, under the pretence that the provision for that purpose in the treaty has expired. You are not ignorant, sir, of the value that the Western inhabitants of the United States place upon that right, nor of the spirit with which they will defend it; a spirit to which the Government must yield, even if they could themselves be indifferent to the object. It is peculiarly unhappy, sir, that this circumstance should have happened at the very moment that France is about to possess that country; since, taken in connexion with the silence of the French Government, as to its intention, it will (I very much fear) give room to jealous and suspicious persons to suppose that the court of Spain has, in this instance, acted in concurrence with that of France; though, sir, I do too much justice to the integrity of France to believe that she would approve of a breach of treaty, and render their first entrance into our vicinity an act of hostility; yet it certainly is of a nature to call the immediate attention of France to the several matters which I had the honor to mention to you, the neglect of which has excited the liveliest sensation in the United States. I therefore avail myself of this opportunity and the permission you gave me to offer you the outline of a treaty that I presume will afford the most obvious benefits to France, and strengthen the connexion which every enlightened American wishes to subsist between her and the United States.

Presuming that the Floridas are in the hands of France, and unless they are Louisiana can never be worth her possessing, because it affords no ports for its own protection, I shall predicate what I have to offer upon that presumption.

France can have but three objects in the possession of Louisiana and Florida: The first is the command of the Gulf: Second, the supply of her Islands: Third, an outlet for her people, if (which however appears to me a very distant expectation) her European population should be too great for her territory. The first of these will be effectually secured by the possession of West Florida, which includes the Bay of St. Esprit and Pensacola, together with the town and harbor of St. Augustine. There are no other ports of the smallest importance east of the Mississippi. The second will be better effected by confining their establishment to some reasonable limits on the sea-coast, or within a moderate distance from it, than by scattering their capital and inhabitants over an extensive territory, which will have a tendency to render them savage and independent, and compel France to keep up a very expensive establishment to protect them from the incursions of savages.

This country must either be settled by foreigners, or by emigrants from France. In the first case no nation in Europe can retain them in a state of dependence: because they will, when settled some hundred miles from the sea, be absolutely inaccessible to their power. In the second, the emigration will be such a drain to the wealth and population of France, as will inflict as deep a wound to her agriculture and manufactures as that felt by her on the revocation of the edict of Nantz; or by Spain, on the expulsion of the Moors; and, after all, the day on which they will be independent will arrive whenever they shall have sufficient wealth and strength no longer to need her aid.

Having treated this subject more at large in a paper which you have had the goodness to read, I will not dwell upon it here; but propose what it appears to be the true policy of France to adopt, as effecting all her objects, and at the same time conciliating the affections of the United States, giving a permanency to her establishments, which she can in no other way hope for. First, let France cede to the United States so much of Louisiana as lays above the mouth of the river Arkansas. By this a barrier will be placed between the colony of France and Canada, from which she may, otherwise, be attacked with the greatest facility, and driven out before she can derive any aid from Europe. Let her retain the country lying on the west of the Mississippi and below the Arkansas river; a country capable of supporting fifteen millions of inhabitants. By this, she will place a barrier between the United States and Mexico, if (which I hope will never be the case) they should have the wild idea of carrying their arms into that country; and at the same time be at hand to protect the Spanish establishments against the ambitious views of any European power. Let her possess East Florida as far as the river Perdido, with all the ports on the Gulf, and cede West Florida, New Orleans, and the territory on the west bank of the Mississippi, to the United States. This cession will be only valuable to the latter from its giving them the mouths of the river Mobile, and other small rivers, which penetrate their territory, and in calming their apprehensions relative to the Mississippi. The land ceded, if we except a narrow strip on the bank of the river, will, for the most part, consist of barren sands and sunken marshes; while that retained by France on the west side of the Mississippi includes the great bulk of the settlements and a rich and fertile country. It may be supposed that New Orleans is a place of some moment; it will be so to the United States, but not to France, because Fort Leon, on the opposite bank, affords a much more advantageous station; has equal advantages as a harbor; is higher, healthier, and more defensible; and, as the great bulk of the settlements must necessarily be on that side, the capital must be transplanted there, even if France continued in possession of New Orleans, which is a small town built of wood, and upon which all the expenses that France should make in public buildings, &c. would ultimately be thrown away when the capital was removed.

The right of depot which the United States claim, and will never relinquish, must be the source of continual disputes and animosities between the two nations, and ultimately lead the United States to aid any foreign Power in the expulsion of France from that colony. Independent of this, as the present commercial capital of New Orleans is mostly American, it will be instantly removed to Natchez; to which the United States can give such advantages as to render New Orleans of little importance.

Upon any other plan, sir, it needs but little foresight to predict that the whole of this establishment must pass into the hands of Great Britain; who has, at the same time, the command of the sea, and a martial colony containing every means of attack. While the fleets block up the seaports, she can, without the smallest difficulty, attack New Orleans from Canada with fifteen or twenty thousand men, and a host of savages.

France, by grasping at a desert and an insignificant town, and thereby throwing the weight of the United States into the scale of Britain, will render her mistress of the new world. By the possession of Louisiana and Trinidad the colonies of Spain will lie at her mercy. By expelling France from Florida and possessing the ports on the Gulf, she will command the islands. The East and the West Indies will pour their commodities into her ports; and the precious metals of Mexico, combined with the treasures of Hindostan, enable her to purchase nations whose aid she may require in confirming her power.

Though it would comport with the true policy, and the magnanimity of France, gratuitously to offer these terms to the United States, yet they are not unwilling to purchase them at a price suited to their value, and to their own circumstances; in the hope that France will at the same time satisfy her distressed citizens the debts which they have a right by so many titles to demand.

These short hints, I flatter myself, will serve to draw your attention to the subject; in which case I am satisfied that many other reasons for the adoption of this plan will suggest themselves to your reflection; reasons on which I do not, from a respect to your time, think it necessary to enlarge. I would only observe that Congress are now in session; that if no treaty is concluded before they rise, or if a minister should go only with powers to treat, without being the bearer of any thing conclusive, he will have to encounter unnumbered suspicions and jealousies; and when he opens the negotiation, he will have to contend with all the intrigues of the court that is most interested in preventing the completion of objects so hostile to its views. Many things are ratified when a treaty is formed, that would be obstacles to the formation of one in a popular Government.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my high consideration.

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Rufus King, minister to England.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 29, 1803.

SIR:

My letter of the 23d ult., with a postscript of the 3d of this month, communicated the information which had been received at those dates relating to the violation at New Orleans of our treaty with Spain; together with what had then passed between the House of Representatives and the Executive on the subject. I now enclose a subsequent resolution of that branch of the Legislature. Such of the debates connected with it as took place with open doors will be seen in the newspapers. In those debates, as well as in indications from the press, you will perceive, as you would readily suppose, that the cession of Louisiana to France has been associated as a ground of much solicitude with the affair at New Orleans. Such, indeed, has been the impulse given to the public mind by these events that every branch of the Government has felt the obligation of taking the measures most likely, not only to re-establish our present rights, but to promote arrangements by which they may be enlarged and more effectually secured. In deliberating on this subject, it has appeared to the President that the importance of the crisis called for the experiment of an extraordinary mission, carrying with it the weight attached to such a measure, as well as the advantage of a more thorough knowledge of the views of the Government and of the sensibility of the public, than could be otherwise conveyed. He has accordingly selected for this service, with the approbation of the Senate, Mr. Monroe, formerly our minister plenipotentiary at Paris, and lately Governor of Virginia, who will be joined with Mr. Livingston in a commission extraordinary to treat with the French republic; and with Mr. Pinckney in a like commission to treat, if necessary, with the Spanish Government.

Mr. Monroe is expected here to-morrow, and he will probably sail shortly afterwards from New York.

These communications will enable you to meet the British minister in conversation on the subject stated in your letter of May 7th, 1802. The United States are disposed to live in amity with their neighbors, whoever they may be, as long as their neighbors shall duly respect their rights; but it is equally their determination to maintain their rights against those who may not respect them; premising, where the occasion may require, the peaceable modes of obtaining satisfaction for wrongs, and endeavoring, by friendly arrangements and provident stipulations, to guard against the controversies most likely to occur.

Whatever may be the result of the present mission extraordinary, nothing certainly will be admitted into it not consistent with our prior engagements. The United States and Great Britain have agreed, each for itself, to the free and common navigation by the other of the river Mississippi; each being left, at the same time, to a separate adjustment with other nations of questions between them relative to the same subject. This being the necessary meaning of our treaties with Great Britain, and the course pursued under them, a difference of opinion seems to be precluded. Any such difference would be matter of real regret: for it is not only our purpose to maintain the best faith with that nation, but our desire to cherish a mutual confidence and cordiality, which events may render highly important to both nations.

Your successor has not yet been named, and it is now possible that the time you may have fixed for leaving England will arrive before any arrangements for the vacancy can have their effect. Should this be the case, the President, sensible of the inconveniency to which you might be subjected by an unexpected detention, thinks it would not be reasonable to claim it of you. It may be hoped that the endeavors to prevent an interval in the legation will be successful; and, as it cannot be more than a very short one, no great evil can well happen from it.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

RUFUS KING, Esq., &c.

R. R. Livingston to James Madison.

PARIS, February 5, 1803.

DEAR SIR:

Not knowing where to direct the enclosed, I submit it to your care. The bearer of this to Nantz waits; so that I can write you nothing, but that the Louisiana armament is still ice bound. The Floridas not yet ceded, owing, I believe, to some difficulty about Parma, and the solicitude of the Emperor of Russia to provide for the King of Sardinia. Spain is however prepared to make the cession, and I presume it will be done. I have precise answers from you to none of my inquiries; and am much at a loss how to act.

I have much to say, but am not allowed to enlarge. You shall hear from me by the first safe conveyance.

I am, dear sir, with the highest esteem and respect, your most obedient humble servant,

R. R. LIVINGSTON.

HON. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Charles Pinckney and James Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 17, 1803.

SIR:

You will be herewith furnished with a joint commission to treat with His Catholic Majesty, and with a letter of credence to him. For the object of the commission, and as a guide to your negotiations, I refer you to the instructions given in relation to the French Government. Whatever portion of the arrangements contemplated may be found to depend not on the French, but on the Spanish Government, is to be sought from the latter, on the like terms as if they had depended on the former.

The scale of value applied to the distinct territories in question will deserve particular attention; so will the provision for paying our citizens who have claims on Spain out of the sums stipulated as the price of her territorial cessions. Among these claims it will be important to include, not only those within the description contained in the convention signed by Mr. Pinckney in August last, but such as may be founded on unlawful acts committed within Spanish responsibility by other than Spanish subjects, and on acts committed by Spanish subjects, within the Spanish colonies, inconsistent with true equity, though not with the forms of law.

Your particular attention will also be due, in case a cession should not be obtained, to an enlargement of our right of deposite at New Orleans, to the establishment of suitable deposites at the mouths of the rivers, passing from the United States through the Floridas, as well as to the free navigation of those rivers by citizens of the United States. Useful hints on these subjects may be found in the letter of which a copy is annexed from the consul of the United States at New Orleans.

I refer for another object which will deserve your attention, to the letter from the Department of State of the 27th of November, to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States, which urges the necessity of some provision by the Governments of Europe having American colonies, by which the irregular and injurious proceedings of colonial officers towards the United States may be more effectually controlled, or more expeditiously corrected, than by crossing the Atlantic with representations on such occasions. Such a provision is not more due to our just expectations than to the interests which those Governments have in maintaining the amicable relations which subsist with the United States. In the same letter, notice was given that the Spanish Government would be held responsible for whatever damages might be sustained by our citizens in consequence of the violation of the treaty by the Intendant at New Orleans. It will be proper to obtain from that Government a stipulation that will provide for such contingent damages. In case the convention, already on foot, should be open for such an article, it may be therein inserted. Should that opportunity not exist, it will be necessary to authorize, by a supplemental article, the commissioners appointed under that convention, to award the indemnifications.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

JAMES MONROE, &c.

R. R. Livingston to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, February 18, 1803.

DEAR SIR:

I have been honored by yours of the —— November. I am pleased to find that you are satisfied with my applications to the Government on the subject of the debt: I am only sorry that those applications have hitherto been unsuccessful, and, as far as appears, will continue to be, unless some motive more efficacious than that of justice, or national faith or credit, is held out. To enter into the financial arrangements of people in power here would lead me into a very delicate discussion, which would not tend to any advantage proportioned to the risk it might subject me to. I still think that if any thing is done to satisfy our citizens, it must be by some advantageous offer on the part of our Government. You will find some of my ideas on that subject sketched in my former letters.

As you have intimated the propriety of opening some other channel of communication with the First Consul than through the minister, this I have effectually done, so as to have got several unofficial communications under his eye, and to have learnt his sentiments thereon. I can have a personal conference with him when I choose, having made arrangements for the purpose; but I defer it for two reasons: First, I have never yet had any specific instructions from you how to act or what to offer. To meet him merely to talk of the justice of our claims, and of our rights on the Mississippi, would be only to say ungracious truths, and excite prejudices which may render a future conference more difficult; and second, because it is one of the traits of his character when he has once fully avowed a sentiment not easily to change it. I have, therefore, thought it best to address myself officially to the minister, and unofficially to the only man supposed to have any sort of influence over him. I have accordingly put into his hands some notes containing plain truth mixed with that species of personal attention which I know to be most pleasing. The delicate subject of these notes makes me unwilling to send them unless I can find time to put them in cipher, which I fear will not be the case by this conveyance; you will, however, have them in the first letter I write to the President, which will be by this or the next conveyance. I do not mention the channel I allude to, because I wish it only to be known to yourself and the President, and my last letter to him has sufficiently explained it. The only basis on which I think it possible to do any thing here is to connect our claims with our offers to purchase the Floridas. Upon this subject my notes turn. I have first endeavored to show how little advantage France is likely to make from these colonies; the temptation they offer to Britain to attack them by sea and from Canada; the effect the conquest of them by Britain would have upon the islands; and the monopoly which that conquest would give to a rival Power of the trade of the West as well as of the East Indies. I have dwelt upon the importance of a friendly intercourse between them and us, both as it respects their commerce and the security of their islands; and I have proposed to them the relinquishment of New Orleans and West Florida, as far as the river Perdido, together with all the territory lying to the north of the Arkansas, under an idea that it was necessary to interpose us between them and Canada, as the only means of preventing an attack from that quarter. I did not speak of East Florida because I found they consider the navigation of the Gulf as very important; for this I proposed an indefinite sum, not wishing to mention any till I should receive your instructions, that it should be a condition of this treaty that the American debt should be inscribed on their five per cent. stock. I knew it would be vain to render them our creditors by deducting this out of our payment; because actual money would alone have any effect in carrying the plan through; and even that must be managed with some circumspection, or no plan will succeed. These propositions, with certain accompaniments, were well received, and were some days under the First Consul's consideration; when it was thought a better bargain might be made on the spot; and I was told that General Bernadotte would have full power to treat on this subject in America on the basis on which I had placed it. My answer to this information you will find in the enclosed note. I am now lying on my oars in hopes of something explicit from you. I consider the object of immense importance; and this, perhaps, the favorable moment to press it: because the affairs of the islands are yet very doubtful, and the armament is still blocked up by the ice in Holland; though as we now have a thaw here I fear they will not be so much longer. My plan is much relished by the person through whom it was proposed. General Bernadotte sees the awkward situation in which he will be placed if he goes out while our demands remain unsatisfied. But no body dares to offer an opinion when that of the First Consul has been expressed. And, at present, a very unexpected difficulty has arisen. I told you that Parma would be offered for the Floridas, and that General Bournonville was sent to negotiate the business. It was never doubted a moment here that it would be effected; this I learned from Talleyrand and the Spanish ambassador. They [intimated] that the treaty would be signed the day the King returned from Barcelona; and their information accorded with that which Lord Whitworth had received. I learn now from the Spanish ambassador that the thing has met with some difficulty, as he says, not because of any aversion in the court to make the cession, but of some difference between the Prince of Peace and General Bournonville. I believe, however, that this is not the sole cause; but that Spain begins to see that, in receiving Parma, she will receive nothing; as it will be rendered subservient to another arrangement, as I hinted in my last. You will consider this rather as a conjecture than as any thing I am perfectly founded in relating. The essential fact for us is that the Floridas are not yet ceded. Mr. Dazara yesterday told me that he began to have his doubts whether they would be: but France is fully impressed with the nullity of her possession in Louisiana unless she has some port in the Gulf. Indeed the minister told me yesterday that there were no difficulties of any moment. I presume that she will, ultimately, find some way to cut the gordian knot; and I cannot but sincerely wish that you may have availed yourselves of the pretence Spain has given you to take possession. It will be best to treat with the subject in our hands: but, at all events, tell me what to do if they should go into the hands of France; and fix the sum you are willing to give in case they should listen anew to my proposition; for as to Bernadotte doing any thing with you, I have no great faith. I pray you again to give me some instructions; for I may be acting contrary to your intentions: and I should be very sorry to do any thing that you may find it proper to disavow. I am not satisfied, from examining my instructions, and commission, that I am empowered to do any thing but the common routine of business. As I did not receive this till I was going off I had no opportunity of objecting to them. I find that I have no precise diplomatic character, not even an envoy ordinary or extraordinary; though it had been usual for the United States to grant this latter grade to gentlemen of less standing than myself.

But this by the by: which I should not have mentioned if I did not find that it is not quite so agreeable here, as Bernadotte is a man of high rank, and would have wished, like his brother generals, to have gone out with a more elevated rank, but which they cannot give while the United States only retain a minister plenipotentiary here. It is proper that I should say a few words on General Bernadotte; he is one of the old Jacobin party; and has been much looked up to by them; but being brother-in-law to Joseph Bonaparte, he is favorably connected; but has not ceased to be an object of some jealousy. And I believe you may consider his present mission as an honorable banishment. He proposes only to stay a few months in America. I have had many conversations with him. His dispositions are just such as I would wish with respect to us; but his temper is warm and fiery, and you will have to flatter his pride, and that of his nation, if you would stand well with him.

In several conversations that I have had with Lord Whitworth I find that Britain is very averse to the projected exchange for the Floridas; and he thinks that, if effected, it will be taken up very warmly by the nation. Mr. King, however, in an answer this day received to some questions I have put on that subject, thinks differently. I find that the sentiments of the two nations, with respect to each other, have totally changed from what they were a year ago; they at present, mortally hate each other; and nothing but the want of allies keeps Britain from breaking out. You will find in one of the Moniteurs I have sent you, a curious journal of Sebastiani, which has been evidently published to prepare this nation for some new operation in Egypt: it is extremely offensive to the British. I have a letter from Mr. Graham, who is far from being satisfied with the conduct of the Spanish Court; who act like this in saying nothing on the subject of their treaty with France, and who have passed a law prohibiting any American vessel to enter their ports till they have performed a quarantine in some foreign port.

I mentioned to you my wish to be empowered to recognize the Italian Republic; to be accredited to the Consul, as has been done by most of those Powers who wish to please him; and as this is a compliment without expense, it might not be amiss to pay it, particularly as we shall have some commercial connexion with the Italian States.

From the best accounts I can receive from Holland the armament will be detained there till about the last of March, so that you will not have them in New Orleans till June; a precious interval, of which you may think it prudent to avail yourselves.

I broke off here that I might have an explicit conversation with the minister founded upon the newspaper intelligence from our country; for I have had no other since the date of your letter of —— November. I endeavoured to impress him strongly with the idea of our determination never to suffer our rights on the Mississippi to be impeded; and of the little value that that country would be to them in the production of a revenue; of the almost certainty of war between them and the savages in case their stipends were withheld; the pain it must give the First Consul to be the means of the destruction of the white inhabitants, whom it would be impossible to defend; and upon the benefits that would result to the commerce and manufactures of France from a friendly connexion with us. These seemed to make an impression upon him; and he promised to represent them strongly to the First Consul to-morrow; but added, that however my other plans might be received, I must consider the purchase of the country as out of the question; intimating that a sale was below their dignity; so that I fear my hopes, founded on their necessities, are frustrated.

I am, dear sir, with the most respectful consideration, your obedient humble servant.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

The Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

[The following, Nos. 2 and 3, are supposed to be the memoirs referred to in Mr. Livingston's despatch of the 18th February.]

No. 2.

To ————

I am sensible, sir, that I have already taxed your patience in the memoirs that I have submitted to your attention: but, sir, (pardon the frankness with which I speak) the critical moment is arrived which rivets the connexion of the United States to France, or binds a young and growing people for ages hereafter to her mortal and inveterate enemy.

How highly I estimate the alliance of France, and how much I believe the happiness of both nations may be promoted by it, not only appears from the whole of my political conduct, but has been stated in an essay upon the relative maritime power of France and Britain, which, as I have learned, has been honored by the First Consul's attention.

The United States have at present but two possible causes of difference with France—the debt due to her citizens, and the possession of Louisiana. The first of these France is not only bound to pay by the laws of justice, but by the solemn stipulations of a treaty which has been observed with the utmost good faith by the United States, who have advanced large sums in consequence, without suffering themselves to doubt that it would meet with equal attention on the part of France. Give me leave to add, sir, that your signature was considered as a guarantee of that treaty by the people of the United States, who had long since learned to estimate the candor and integrity of your character.

My present object, sir, is to show, in a very few words, that Louisiana affords France not only the means of discharging their debt, and promoting the other object which I took the liberty to hint at before, but even of placing her colony of Louisiana in a better situation, should it be her wish to retain that colony, than she would do by listening to no compromise with the United States.

The object of France in forming this colony is to supply her islands; to afford an outlet for such of her population as she thinks she can spare from home. But not to scatter her people over an immense wilderness, where they will be lost for her and to the world; or to fill her territory with inhabitants that would withdraw their allegiance the moment they found themselves in a situation so to do; which will certainly be the case if these, or if any but the natives of France are permitted to settle it.

It is, then, the interest of France to limit her territory, and to render it as compact as possible, without placing it at such a distance from the sea as to put it totally out of her control. While, with the remainder of the territory, she fulfils other important objects, and, above all, builds her future connexion with the United States upon mutual interests, and that strict and solemn regard for treaties which can alone lull the apprehensions that her power excites, and to which, more than to the force of her arms, Rome was indebted for the dominion of the world.

The produce of Louisiana must be conveyed by the Mississippi; and there are no ports for her marine to the west of Pensacola. If, therefore, France should possess Pensacola, and all the ports to the east of it, she will have the complete command of the Gulf. And if she possesses the free navigation of the Mississippi, and all Louisiana lying to the west of that river, and south of the river Arkansas, comprehending a tract nearly as large as the ancient Government of France, she will have more territory than will suffice to supply all the wants of her marine, and West India colonies, with such articles as that country can produce.

Louisiana, within these limits, can support a population of fifteen millions of people. You will judge, sir, whether it would be possible for France to retain more than that number in subjection; or whether it would be good policy to extend her population beyond the number she can govern.

The settlers to the north of the river Arkansas would be too far from the sea to fear any force from France. A distant colony must be of moderate size, compactly settled, and not remote from the sea, or the parent State will soon lose all control over it. The interest of France, then, requires that her colony in Louisiana should not exceed the limits I mention, and the separation of this territory from that lying to the east of the river Perdido would afford an additional security to France for the possession of both, not only as it would break the connexion of the colonies, but as their interest would be totally different, the last possessing little valuable land, (for both East and West Florida are barren tracts,) would be military posts and commercial entrepots; from which the trade would be carried on to and from the Mississippi in small vessels; while that with France would, on account of her safe and commodious harbors, center in East Florida.

The inhabitants of this country would be deeply interested in a continuance of their connexion with the mother country. While the interposition of West Florida, in the hands of the United States, would prevent any coercion on the part of the inhabitants of Louisiana, if they should at any time be disposed to revolt, East Florida, on the contrary, while loyal to France, would, by means of her navy, have a powerful control on the colony of Louisiana.

The example of England should have some weight. The Dutch possessed New York; England, for the sake of uniting her colonies, purchased it from Holland. Had it been left in the hands of the Dutch, that union, which has lost the whole to Britain, would have been prevented.

The colonies of Louisiana and East Florida, within the limits proposed, being thus secured, the remainder of the Spanish cession is only valuable as it enables France to pursue other great objects, to wit: the payment of the debt in conformity to her treaty; and the conciliation of an ally which may on so many important occasions be useful to her; and the one of no less magnitude to which I have in my last note the honor to allude.

The United States possess the east side of the Mississippi, from its source to the thirty-first degree of north latitude. It would be very interesting to them to acquire the possession of the remainder of the east bank of that river to its mouth, and that narrow strip of land which lies between the thirty-first degree of latitude and the sea, as far as the river Perdido; not on account of the value of the land, for, except a very small quantity on the banks of the river, it is for the most part a sandy barren, or a sunken marsh; but because it would give them the mouths of those rivers which run through their territory, and afford an outlet to the sea.

To the cession of this country but one possible objection can be raised on the part of France; it may attach a value to New Orleans which it by no means merits. The fact is, that to France, who has the choice of fixing her capital on either side of the river, New Orleans has no circumstance to recommend it. It is placed on the naked bank; it has no port, basin, or quay, for shipping; has no fortification of any strength; and is incapable of being rendered a good military position; and the houses are only of wood, subject to continual accidents. This situation was fixed first by France on account of its being on the Florida side of the river where the settlements commenced: but as it was soon found that the lands of the west side of the river were much richer, the principal part of the population is now there. The bank opposite to New Orleans is higher and better calculated for a town: it already has a strong post in Fort Leon, the most commanding position in that country; and the harbor, or rather the road, is in all things equal to that of New Orleans. As a Government house and barracks, stores, &c. must be built either at New Orleans or at Fort Leon, there can be no doubt, even if France retains both, that the latter ought to have the preference, since a regular and handsome capital could be laid out there, and in a healthier and stronger situation than at New Orleans.

It is highly probable that, in this case, the superiority it would have in point of health, the advantages of the Government, and, above all, the free trade with France and her islands, would render it in three years more populous than New Orleans now is. The French merchants would sell their houses in the one to the Americans, and establish themselves in the other. Should France retain the whole of the Spanish cession on both sides of the river, she will find it absolutely necessary to remove her capital to the west side. The river for three months is impassable from the violence of the inundation, and the trees that it brings down with it. As the bulk of the colony is on the west side of the river, it must necessarily draw its capital after it, or submit to be cut off from it during this period. A town will therefore rise at Fort Leon, where the richest establishments are already formed, which must increase with the population of the country.

The difficulty of removing the capital from New Orleans will increase as its buildings become more numerous, and its population greater. It is, therefore, in every event the true interest of France to commence the establishment of a capital on a regular plan on the west side of the river, where it must ultimately be, rather than expend money upon the old town of New Orleans, which they will find too much insulated for the capital of Louisiana.

Permit me, sir, to examine the subject in a point of view, which I conceive is important not only to France and the United States, but to every maritime power. It cannot be doubted that the peace between France and Britain has been too disadvantageous to the latter to be of long duration. Strong symptoms of an approaching rupture have already appeared; and the statesmen of both countries will begin to examine the points of attack and defence, and the acquisitions that afford the most permanent advantages. The Cape, Malta, and Egypt, have already awakened the cupidity of Great Britain. Should she extend her views across the Atlantic (and what is to limit them?) the cession of Louisiana to France offers her the fairest pretence to invade that country, either from Canada or by the Atlantic.

She felt no reluctance in leaving them to Spain; but she will not quietly see them in the hands of France. She will strain every nerve to acquire them. By uniting them with Canada and Nova Scotia she encircles the United States; and, having the same manners, the same religion, the same language, and a number of partisans among her commercial inhabitants of the United States; having carefully removed every conflicting question, and even conciliated, by the liberality of her restitutions, those whom her conduct during the war had irritated; it will be difficult to say what will be the extent of her influence. But, independently of this circumstance, if Britain should unite Louisiana and West Florda to her other American possessions, no power in Europe will be able to oppose her force. The bay of St. Esprit will become another Gibraltar, from which she will ravage every island, and every continental possession of France, Spain, and Holland; she will monopolize the commodities of the West as she has already done those of the East Indies. Not a moment, sir, should be lost for placing a barrier between the settlements that France may wish to retain in Louisiana and Canada, by ceding to the United States the portion I have proposed above the Arkansas; and by the cession of New Orleans and West Florida, to take from them the first inducement to attack that country. France should exert all her resources and all her strength in the immediate fortification of Pensacola and the bay of St. Esprit; or, if she has not the means of doing it, she should leave them in the hands of Spain (if she can consent to leave her at peace) or to some other neutral nation. For I will venture to say that the acquisition of that country, by a nation who possesses Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Canada, with a powerful maritime force, will annihilate the external trade of every other nation in Europe; and that it would be the true interest even of Spain herself, rather to see her ports in Florida in the hands of the United States, who alone can defend them, than to keep them in her own, at the risk of having them wrested from her by Britain. Perhaps, in the present state of things, considering the superiority of the British navy at this moment, the great capital that it will require to reinstate the French islands, and her continental possessions in the East Indies and in America, the wisest measure would be, not only to make the cession I have asked, but to hypothecate the whole of East Florida for a term of years, for such part of the American debt as may remain unsatisfied.

But this is a mere hasty, undigested idea, rather intended to turn your attention to this subject, than as matter sufficiently matured to take the form of a proposition. I cannot, sir, conclude this note without turning your attention to the present feelings of the people of all parties in the United States with respect to France. The total silence of the French Government on the subject of their intention as to the navigation of the Mississippi, and their rights of entrepot at New Orleans, secured to them by the most solemn treaty with Spain; the mystery with which all the arrangements of France for taking possession of that country are concealed from the minister of the United States, notwithstanding his repeated notes to the Minister of Exterior Relations on the subject; have excited the most lively apprehensions of designs unfriendly to their commerce and their rights. The total neglect of every measure that leads to a security for their debt, notwithstanding the provisions of the treaty, and the ruin of numbers of their citizens by this; and the very extraordinary decisions which have, in several instances, taken place in the Council of Prizes, for which I have been able to receive not merely no redress but even no answer; contrasted with the good faith, displayed by their own Government with respect to France, with the scrupulous attention that Great Britain has paid to repair, by the most liberal conduct, the abuses she has permitted herself to commit during the war, leads to a belief that France limits her rights by her power; and insensibly disposes them to alliances, both offensive and defensive, which it has heretofore been their policy to avoid. Can it possibly be the interest of France, sir, to drive the United States into these alliances, while she forms colonies, and retains islands in their neighborhood? Can she look with contempt upon an enterprising and hardy nation who possesses means of defence at home, and for a maritime force which will render her respectable abroad? The immense power of France has rendered her an object of jealousy to the old world; while the inhabitants of the new felt no other sensations than those of admiration and respect.

In Europe, France only knows secret enemies and hollow friends. In America, she has grateful allies. Let her not, sir, for the bubble of the day, cast them off; but let her avail herself of the advantages she has acquired, to bind them to her. Should she, relying on her own strength, never need their aid, she still will find a consolation in reflecting that the sacrifices (if such they may be called) she makes, are sacrifices at the altar of justice and national faith. She will cheaply purchase the esteem of men and the favor of Heaven by the surrender of a distant wilderness, which can neither add to her wealth nor to her strength.

JANUARY 7, 1802.*

To ——.

In a conversation which I yesterday had with General Bernadotte, I find that some idea is at present entertained by the First Consul of treating at Washington of the several matters I had the honor to mention to you. I should be extremely pleased at this arrangement, because I should see in it those advantages to my country which are always derived from carrying on a negotiation at home, where the views of the Government are clearly known, where they can avail themselves of every light and information, while the minister with whom they treat is isolated, and must rely only on his own resources and those he draws from suspicious channels. But, sir, these are circumstances which, in the present instance, appear to me to counterbalance those advantages, and which render it peculiarly the interest of France and the United States to come to a more immediate arrangement of several matters that interest them in this negotiation.

I cannot conceal from you, sir, that both the Government and the people of the United States are at present in such a state of mind as to be filled with doubts and jealousies with respect to the views and dispositions of France. Many among her firmest friends are ruined by the inexecution of that article of the treaty which provides for the payment of their debts; many by hasty measures at St. Domingo, and the disregard, in some instances, of the common principles of the law of nations in the decisions of the Council of Prizes. The silence of the French and Spanish Governments on the subject of their intentions relative to the navigation of the Mississippi and the right of entrepot at New Orleans, has given just grounds of alarm. But, sir, a circumstance has just come to my knowledge, though not officially, yet in such a way as leaves me little room to doubt of its authenticity, which cannot fail to drive the United States into some violent measure. "On the 20th of October, the Governor of New Orleans issued a proclamation, in which, speaking of the Americans, he says they will not in future be permitted to make a deposite of their cargo in New Orleans, in conformity to the twenty-second article of their treaty of 27th October, 1795, which has expired." I have examined the treaty: there is no pretence for this construction of it; and, as the right has been regularly exercised till now, it will be generally believed in the United States that this construction could only have been suggested by a wish on the part of France to get rid of the provisions of the treaty before she took possession. Now, sir, I will frankly confess to you that the United States will rather hazard their very existence than suffer the Mississippi to be shut against them. Of this you will easily be convinced when you learn that, when their numbers were but half of what they now are, and their means of defence infinitely less, their instructions to their ministers that made the first treaty with Great Britain were, by no means to sign a treaty without securing the free navigation of that river. You will not, therefore, be surprised if this step of Spain should wind up the American people and Government to so high a pitch of resentment as shall lead them to a close and intimate connexion with Britain, and perhaps to an immediate rupture with Spain.

If, under these circumstances, an ambassador should arrive in America, without being the bearer of a treaty which terminates their differences, and should propose to enter upon a treaty with the American Government, they will naturally ask, why has our minister been able to effect nothing in fourteen months? Why have our debts remained unpaid? Why has he received no sort of satisfaction on any subject on which he has addressed himself to the Government? And why does France now, at this late day, prefer making a treaty in America to concluding one at home? While, at the same time, she is sending out large armies to the islands, and possessing herself of Louisiana and the Floridas. Is it not to paralyze those measures of security that common prudence would suggest to the United States? Is it not to stop the treaty which we are about to make relative to our western boundary with Great Britain? Is it not to give France time to arrange her affairs in the islands, to strengthen her ports in America? Some months will elapse before the treaty is made, and many more before it is ratified. What security have we that this treaty, when made, will meet the approbation of the First Consul, when time has made a change in circumstances? These, sir, and a thousand other doubts, will arise in the minds of the citizens of the United States, and they will be blown up into certainties by the agents of Britain, who are to be found in all our commercial towns.

There is no doubt that the Government of the United States will receive with attention the French ambassador; that they will listen to his propositions; and will treat with him with pleasure upon the basis I have mentioned. But they will not, on that account, cease to consider the conclusion as very distant, or relinquish any measure that they may deem it wise to pursue, in case no treaty was proposed. Treating under these circumstances, I fear that there will be much less ground to hope a cordial and friendly intercourse than if the earliest moment was embraced, and the ambassador of France was the bearer of a treaty already completed.

There are other considerations, sir, which I believe will have some weight with the First Consul, if suggested to him. The terms I have proposed as the basis of a treaty, are precisely those which would be most repugnant to the interests of Britain. By interposing the United States between Canada and the French establishments on the Mississippi, her views upon a communication with the sea by that channel are completely cut off. By giving France the ports on the Gulf of Mexico, the British islands are held in check. By interposing the establishments of France between the United States and Mexico, by the only practicable route, the jealousies of Spain, with respect to the United States, will be calmed, and she will have in France an ally at hand to protect her from the ambitious views of Britain. At present, Britain feels little uneasiness about the possessions of France in Louisiana, because, believing that they will operate to render the United States enemies of France, they count upon their aid in dispossessing them, and in reaping the fruits of their labor. It will be extremely difficult, if a negotiation is set on foot in the United States to conduct it with such secrecy as to escape the vigilance of Britain. In a popular government, where she has many friends, it may not be difficult to prevent success. Nor will she hesitate to make important sacrifices to defeat this object.

There are other matters which, though less important, deserve consideration. France apprehends that the rebels in the islands are supplied with arms, &c. from the United States. I trust that apprehension has hitherto been unfounded. She may wish for laws pointed to this object. The party hostile to France, the persons jealous and suspicious of her views in their present state of irritation, may consider her islands as the point in which she is most vulnerable; and, while they decline any active part in support of the revolters, they may be unwilling to see them reduced to submission. The British influence will have room to operate on this subject. Laws pass very slowly, and there are many means of obstructing their passage. But a treaty is, in the United States, the most solemn of all laws. Any provision that we agree upon here must be binding. If, then, a treaty is formed here, the minister, instead of having a law to solicit, in the face of a thousand intrigues and jealousies, will carry the law out with him, and will have only to watch over its execution.

* This date should, no doubt, be 1803.

All these, and many other reasons, which I will spare you the trouble of reading, suggest the propriety of finishing the treaty here, and that as speedily as possible. It is certain that more light can be acquired relative to that country at Paris, (if doubt should be entertained as to my assertions,) than any foreign minister could obtain at Washington.

I speak, sir, perhaps, with too much freedom on the views of your country and my own. But I speak with freedom, from a conviction of the integrity of my own intentions, and the absolute certainty that the measures I suggest are not less the interest of the one than of the other. As no chicanery, no crooked policy, will mingle itself in our treaty, one may be concluded in a week, if the Consul shall be pleased to name yourself or General Bernadotte, in whose candor and information I have great confidence. It would certainly be very grateful to him to be the bearer of a treaty which insures him the cordial and friendly reception in the United States that his mission and his merits entitle him to.

I am, sir, &c.

ROBERT R. LIVINGSTON.

James Madison, Secretary of State, to Robert R. Livingston, minister to France.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 23, 1803.

SIR:

Since my last, which was of the 18th of January, I have received your several letters of the 11th and 14th of November 1802.

As you will receive this from the hands of Mr. Monroe, I refer to him for full information relative to our internal affairs generally, and, in particular, to the violation of our right of deposite at New Orleans, with the impressions and proceedings which have resulted from it.

In his hands, also, are the commission and instructions in which he is joined with yourself, to treat with the French Government for an enlargement of our rights and our security in the southwestern neighborhood of the United States. These documents, with the communications and explanations which Mr. Monroe will be able to add, will put you in full possession of the subject.

The negotiation to be opened will bring the disposition and views of the French Government to a test. If it should meet the negotiation in a proper spirit, and with a just estimate of the real interests of France, not only a favorable issue may be expected, but it will be proper for you to avail yourself of the occasion, to insist on a prompt and complete fulfilment of the convention, so long delayed on that side, but which was so readily and so liberally executed on ours; and on a fair discharge of the pecuniary engagements of every description, to the citizens of the United States.

The occasion may be proper, also, for obtaining satisfaction to Captains Rodgers and Davidson for the outrages committed on them in St. Domingo. The death of General Le Clerc will have lessened the influence of his connexion with the subject, in obstructing a just consideration of it.

A return to your representations on the subject of the French navigation laws, may be equally recommended by the occasion. Although the present session of Congress, like the last, will pass over without any countervailing regulations here, it cannot be doubted that the discriminations made by France, with a view to exclude our shipping from a fair share in the freight of our own productions, will, and can be effectually counteracted by the United States, if not corrected by herself. Should a disposition appear to take up the whole subject of commerce between the two countries, with a view to conventional regulations on just principles, the President authorizes you to express a like disposition in the Government of the United States. But he prefers for the discussions, this place to Paris, for the double reason that the requisite commercial information could be more readily gained here than there, and that a French negotiator might here be more easily and fully impressed with the importance of our commerce to France, than could be done at Paris. Mr. Otto, it is presumed, would not be an unfavorable minister for such a business; and may, if the French Government incline, bring with him the necessary authorities and instructions for entering upon it.

If, instead of these friendly sentiments and purposes, which may be improved into a solid and satisfactory adjustment of the mutual interests of the two nations, the French Government should betray a settled repugnance to just arrangements with the United States; and, above all, if it should manifest or betray a hostile spirit towards them, or be found to meditate projects inconsistent with their rights, and, consequently, leading to a rupture, not a moment is to be lost in forwarding the information, in order that the measures, both external and internal, adapted to such a state of things, may be seasonably taken.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

R. R. LIVINGSTON, Esq., &c.

Extract:—Mr. Madison, Secretary of State, to James Monroe.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 2, 1803.

SIR:

You will herewith receive two commissions with the correspondent instructions, in which you are associated as minister plenipotentiary and extraordinary to the French republic and to His Catholic Majesty; together with the respective letters of credence to those Governments.

Your mission to Madrid will depend on the event of that to Paris, and on the information there to be acquired. Should the entire cession in view be obtained from the French republic, as the assignees of Spain, it will not be necessary to resort to the Spanish Government. Should the whole or any part of the cession be found to depend, not on the French but on the Spanish Government, you will proceed to join Mr. Pinckney in the requisite negotiations with the latter. Although the United States are deeply interested in the complete success of your mission, the Floridas, or even either of them, without the island of New Orleans, on proportionate terms, will be a valuable acquisition.

I have the honor, &c.

JAMES MADISON.

JAMES MONROE, Esq., &c.

Mr. Livingston to Mr. Madison.

PARIS, March 3, 1803.

DEAR SIR:

You will receive, with this, duplicates of two letters which contain a general statement of our affairs here. This is merely to inform you that I have received your letter of the 18th of January, in which you notify me of Mr. Monroe's appointment. I shall do every thing in my power to pave the way for him; and sincerely wish his mission may be attended with the desired effect. It will, however, cut off one resource on which I greatly relied; because I had established a confidence which it will take Mr. Monroe some time to inspire. Enclosed is a letter addressed to the First Consul himself, and sent him before I heard of Mr. Monroe's appointment. The minister told me yesterday that I should have an answer to it in few days. What that answer will be I know not: but I have been indefatigable in my applications to every body who will probably be consulted on this subject. When I arrived here I found Louisiana a very favorite object. Some books were published representing it as a paradise. I think I have greatly aided in dispelling this mania; and, had the Floridas been granted, and the necessary powers given to me, I believe that something might have been effected; because at this moment there is not a man about the court but inclines to our ideas upon the subject. The Floridas are still in the hands of Spain. I have explained the cause in my last: and not knowing how far we might succeed in our negotiations, or what sacrifices you would make, I have thought it best to use every exertion with the Spanish ambassador and the British minister to obstruct that negotiation.

The person of whom you speak may be able to give you information as to the expedition; because he had passed as an important inhabitant of the island, and the General, &c. relied upon his aid in their money-making plans. I am much surprised, however, that he should talk of the designs of this court, the price, &c.; because these he must have derived from his imagination only; as he had no means of seeing any body here that could give him the least information on those subjects. I mention this that the President may not place any sort of reliance upon what he receives through that channel, except as it respects General Victor personally; who, I will venture to say, knows himself less about what passes here than you do: and even this information he must receive with some grains of allowance, as the gentleman has a pretty warm imagination, and is liable to be deceived.

The armament is still ice-bound in Holland.

I am, sir, &c.

ROB. R. LIVINGSTON.

Hon. JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

Mr. Livingston to Citizen Bonaparte, First Consul of France and President of the Italian republic, dated

PARIS, February 27, 1803.
